In the books, it is black and white like a moving zebra crossing , but in the animated films and TV series it is red. It should be noted that in the films, Cruella does not have a chauffeur like in the books , but drives it herself. It crashes at the end of the first film. Dearly compares this to a moving zebra crossing. Cruella also notes that her horn is the loudest motor car horn in the country. She is shown to have a chauffeur who drives her car for her on some occasions. As the Dalmatians make their way through the country, they see Cruella standing on the roof of the car, warming herself via a bakery on fire. Cruella herself is shown to be pretty reckless when it comes to driving said car, such as making drifting turns in the streets, driving extremely fast in snowy conditions, and sometimes running other cars off the road. However, she always blames a near accident on whoever is on the receiving side of the near motor accident. The car is shown to be very resistant to damage. It only begins to break apart when Cruella jumps it through a grove of trees. At this point, the roof and bonnet of the car come off, showing the motor, which has flames in it. She chases after the van, trying to ram it off the road. It is shown to have a license plate that reads: Roger later installs the car into his game demo , where the player Dalmatians Patches and Wizzer throw an explosive barrel at Cruella in the car. At the start of Dalmatians , Alonzo meets Cruella when she is released on parole with the car. However, Ella as the reformed Cruella insists to be called insists on driving them back. Cruella then drives insanely through the streets of Paris, including being on the wrong side of the road and going down the wrong direction of a one-way street. The Series is shown to be red, like it is in the animated films. The car has been damaged a lot in The Series, such as being crushed into a cube via a harvester or crashing into the swamp the latter having it be repaired by Swamp Rat. On some occasions, the car is shown to give off fire trails, which sometimes sets fire to the pavement or bridges which it crosses. The model in the series is a modified s Zimmer Golden Spirit and like in the novel and in the live-action films, the car is black and white with a licence plate that reads: There, they play a game of chicken in the first game, they use their magic to save themselves , where Regina uses her magic to lift the car onto the road, just as the train is about to hit them. In "Sympathy for the DeVil", it is revealed that the car originally belonged to Isaac, the author, who gave it to Cruella. Cruella also seems to have a car just like hers in the underworld version of Storybrooke. In showings of young Cruella, the car for her mother, Madeline , seems to have a similar look to that of the one in the animated Dalmatians. Puppies To The Rescue as a toy line, which Cruella tries to sell. She later uses them in her attempt to abduct the Dalmatian pups, although Domino and Oddball are usually able to counter them. In the game, it is referred to as a "roadster. The car itself has higher speed and abilities than normal cars used in the game. Behind the Scenes Animated Film Filming the model cars. To make the wheels articulate, the animators took a long piece of cloth, taped little pieces of wooden dowling underneath it and then put the car on top of the cloth suspended from a kite string, and then they would pull this long piece of fabric with all these pieces of wooden dowling underneath the wheels and they would shoot a take of that. To give it the look that the car had suspension they put in springs so it would have this little bouncy effect. The footage would then be run through the same Xerox process that was being used to transfer pencil line work onto cels and then painted to what was seen in the final film. When Cruella is seen driving her car up the hill of snow, a sand-like substance was used for it to drive through and shot it all in slow motion. The process of shooting models with those black outlines worked very successful when making One Hundred and One Dalmatians and it was a clever idea to save money.
