David Coulthard McLaren set the fastest time on the first day, while Eddie Irvine was fastest on the second and final day of testing. Arrows performed shakedown runs at the Santa Pod Raceway. The first practice session took place in dry conditions. He was joined on the front row by Jean Alesi , who was four-tenths of a second behind. Olivier Panis was third in his Prost. Heinz-Harald Frentzen was fifth, with Michael Schumacher completing the top six. Hill missed out by just three milliseconds , the slimmest-ever margin. He was followed on the timesheets by Ferrari drivers Irvine and Michael Schumacher who completed the top three positions. David Coulthard was able to pass Alesi on lap two. As this happened Herbert retired thanks to a gearbox problem. Coulthard passed Barrichello on lap six by outbraking him into the Adelaide hairpin. Schumacher at this point was struggling on a car that was set up for a wet race. Behind in the midfield Irvine overtook another car. This time it was Alexander Wurz in the Benetton. Rain began to fall on lap Eddie Irvine pulled into the pits just as the rain started, but Ferrari was not ready for him and his pit stop took 43 seconds. A scramble into the pits ensued, but the leaders were all able to hold their positions. One Lap after Hill pitted he got a puncture, because he hit a wall. And then the safety car was deployed due to the amount of water on the track. The amount of water on the track was so great that three drivers - Jacques Villeneuve , Alexander Wurz , Marc Gené and Alex Zanardi spun while following the safety car. Damon Hill retired with electrical failure while behind the safety car. The restart went cleanly, with no place changes amongst the front-runners. On the same lap, Michael Schumacher suffered an electrical malfunction and lost most of his eight-second lead to Rubens Barrichello. Frentzen won the race after 72 laps to secure his first victory of the season in a time of 1: Damon Hill hinted after the race that this one could have been his last, or if he did compete at Silverstone in the next race he might leave Formula One afterwards.

Move to Rubens' Tube. Since this takes its name from Heinrich Rubens, should the name of the article be "Rubens Tube" or "Rubens' Tube"? Sciprogrammer , 3 November (UTC).

National Gallery, London, 26 October – 15 January ]. National Gallery Company [distributor: Yale University Press, New Haven], The astonishment was all the greater given that the artist was Rubens, whose merits are beyond question but whose popularity rating certainly lags behind many of his contemporaries, the painting a relatively early work ca. It has then to be said that it was not without a degree of risk for the National Gallery to subsequently organize an exhibition that would again address – if in an expanded context – the same material. Moreover, given the spate of Rubens exhibitions in , what was to be learned from yet another show? As it happened, quite a lot. This approach was immediately evident upon entering the first room where the Battle of the Amazons Potsdam; landscape by Jan Brueghel; cat. This juxtaposition showed the extent to which Rubens was still occupied with what he had painted years previously. Instead of simply overwriting his northern experience with the new visual impressions of Italy, he recalled with astonishing clarity his earlier composition, reworked certain central motifs such as the group of two Amazons struggling with Hercules and the mounted Amazon holding aloft a severed head, and incorporated new ideas gleaned in Italy. Precisely how much importance Rubens placed on re-working pre-Italian compositions was further apparent in the display of his three earliest renditions of the Judgement of Paris – for this reviewer a particular treat: In London the focus was on the famous Crouching Venus of Doidalses, present as a small bronze and a large marble version. Their strategic positioning afforded visitors a continually changing perspective of the sculpture itself, and placed it against a changing panorama of paintings, thus illustrating not only how Rubens perceived and incorporated the figure or variations thereof into compositions as diverse as the Fall of Phaeton cat. Another fascinating exhibit was a marble relief of three sleeping putti Galleria Borghese; unfortunately not illustrated in the catalogue , which had been acquired by the Borghese in and on the evidence of a comparison with the group of slain children in the right foreground of the Massacre of the Innocents most probably was known to Rubens. Though the Massacre of the Innocents had previously been seen in the company of many of the exhibits, it came as a surprise that here it appeared quite flat, its figures merging into a rather undifferentiated mass, and possessing somewhat insipid colouring – especially when compared to the luxuriant Samson and Delilah on the opposite wall. It therefore seems to me that the Massacre was most likely painted for a specific location, one where Rubens knew viewers would approach from the left and thus walk into as it were the very centre of the carnage. It was however a great shame that the large Recognition of Philopoemen of cat. Many visitors will have missed seeing this great painting, which would have provided admirable company in the actual exhibition – after all, its compositional structure, with its strong left to right movement, receding albeit abbreviated architecture with greenery, and still life in the lower right, is not altogether different from that of the Massacre of the Innocents , and its strong visual language and coloring could have provided a powerful statement in the last room of the exhibition, which, notwithstanding the presence of fine works, paled in comparison to the earlier rooms. The magnificent still life in the Recognition of Philopoemen was executed by Frans Snyders, with whom Rubens was subsequently to co-operate on many occasions, as indeed he did with Brueghel. The catalogue opens with three relatively short essays. Avoiding the problematic issue of the make-up of the lost original, the authors keep the theme of the exhibition in mind and discuss the Pocketbook as a compendium of invention and creativity by looking in particular at how Rubens reworked familiar motifs. Images of Death , Antwerp, Rubenshuis, The entries are organized into six categories, each prefaced by a short introduction to the particular topographical On the Move; Reworking of Rome; Back in Antwerp or iconographical Battle Painter; Religious Painter; Sequences: Building a Composition grouping; obviously some groupings are more homogenous than others. A more rigorous editing would have removed inaccuracies or inconsistencies, many of which scholars will catch but not the general public. The publication is lavishly illustrated, with comparative works reproduced in color and many interesting details of the actual exhibits. Under the best of circumstances, a catalogue can only offer a pale reflection of the visual experience of the exhibition it documents. The extravagant use of color illustrations throughout the present catalogue, notably for the illustrations of ancient sculpture often shot from unexpected vantage points , does at least go some way towards conveying a flavor of the dynamics of this visually driven exhibition. Rubens Barrichello is another well known name following the list of top drivers from Brazil. Names such as Emerson Fittipaldi, Ayrton Senna and Nelson Piquet. Rubens "Rubinho" Barrichello was born in in Brazil.

It is about the piece of apparatus named for him, in which his name becomes an adjective, not a proper noun. The article is about "Rubens tube: For examples of similar adjectival constructions, see also literally every other scientific apparatus, theory, and concept which is named after someone. The article should be moved back to "Rubens Tube". However, I know I read the part about Ulrich Behn somewhere when writing this article. So far, the only mention I found was in reference 3. At the very least, this shows that Behn came up with the idea for small flames as pressure indicators. Left up for debate is what his first name was and if he indeed did the research at the University of Leipzig. Better images found by URL hacking: My German is poor - have I got this right? It shows flame-maximum at the closed end, which will be a velocity node - no movement, just pressure variation. Behn - presumably not the current Ulrich Behn with an email address at uni-leipzig. Oddly, Rubens reports that the flame-maximum is at the closed end as expected for loud sounds, but with quiet sounds, the maxima and minima exchange places! With quiet sounds, the flame-maxima are at the constant-pressure points; loud sounds give maximum flame at lowest-velocity points. Ya, I noticed that a while ago, and I plan on fixing it some day soon. In a wave, one wavelength is equal to a crest and a trough, or in this case, a compression and a rarefaction. There are three-- Vox Rationis Talk contributes antinodes to each full wavelength. Antinodes are at the greatest amplitudes, positive and negative, to measure across 3 antinodes would still be one cycle, one wavelength, either two peaks and a trough peak to peak or two troughs and a peak trough to trough. The current image suggests one wavelength is five antinodes in length. Since compression and rarefaction occur about times a second, this would be invisible if it occurred. I.e., the article is internally inconsistent. Then the Talk mentions that there are claims that the lowest point of the flame may not be at a pressure anti-node but depends on the amplitude of the flame. While the state of knowledge could be still unsettled, that does not mean that the article should be confusing. Certainly the last half of the last sentence in History should be removed, and the state of current knowledge should be in the explanation section. This is especially true since the picture of the tube does not seem to have either a minimum or a maximum of the flame at the the closed ends of the tube. Please take a moment to review my edit. I made the following changes:

Plot[ edit ] Smoke and Oil Dresden Jordan Peele and Keegan-Michael Key , a pair of assassins known as the "Allentown Brothers", enter a drug-processing facility run by a Mexican drug cartel and kill everyone inside, including the boss King Diaz. Meanwhile, Rell also played by Peele has just been dumped by his girlfriend; he finds the cat on his doorstep, takes an immediate liking to it, and names it Keanu. Rell, who is much happier after taking care of Keanu, takes Clarence out to see a Liam Neeson movie, telling him he needs to loosen up and just be himself. A distraught Rell drags Clarence along to the next-door residence of his weed dealer Hulka Will Forte , who reluctantly reveals that the 17th St. Hulka directs them to a downtown strip club; Rell and Clarence go there, where Rell convinces Clarence to adopt a "gangsta" persona in order to infiltrate the gang, calling themselves "Tectonic" and "Shark Tank". Cheddar has Keanu having renamed him New Jack and fitted him with a do-rag , and they ask for the cat. He will only return the cat to them if they come along as expert advisors for the Blips on a run to sell a new drug called "Holy Shit"; both reluctantly agree. After taking their team through a team-building exercise, Rell, Clarence, Hi-C, and three other gang members drive to their delivery spot. While Clarence stays behind and introduces the young men to the music of George Michael whom he describes as if he were black, to overcome their skepticism , Rell and Hi-C go to make the sale. The buyer turns out to be Anna Faris , who is partying with two friends. When Hi-C refuses, a fight ensues in which Faris and her two guests are both shot and killed by Hi-C, frightening Rell. At the strip club after the run, Clarence accidentally smokes some Holy Shit, and experiences a drug trip in which he appears in the music video for " Faith " by George Michael, and Keanu speaks to him in the voice of Keanu Reeves. Rell begins to worry about his cousin and convinces him to just take Keanu and leave. The two do so, but are abducted on their way to their car by the actual Allentown Boys. The Allentown boys continue to approach them, but Clarence and Rell completely unload the guns into them, seemingly killing them. On their way out of the building searching for Keanu, Rell and Clarence run into the Blips; Cheddar has discovered their real identities when they refuse to shoot a kidnapped Hulka, and forces them to come along to a meeting with the Mexican drug cartel at its mansion in the morning. Clarence and Rell realize that the team-building exercise the two took the gang through has improved their communication; they pick up guns and shoot their way out of the mansion in pursuit of Bacon, who has taken Keanu, only for Rell to be shot in the leg and Clarence shot in the hand. Bacon gets up and attempts to shoot Rell, but Clarence runs him over. Bacon gets up again, but is shot and killed by Cheddar and the Blips. The Blips threaten Rell and Clarence, but Hi-C " secretly a police officer " breaks her cover and forces the Blips to drop their guns. When Cheddar attempts to shoot her, she kills him. She promises to testify for leniency and agrees to go on a date with Rell after they get out of jail. Six months later, Rell and Clarence have only three weeks left on their jail sentences, but have commanded respect among the inmates " including the remaining Blips " for killing the Allentown Boys. In a post-credits scene , the Allentown Boys are revealed to have survived the shooting and get back into their car.

Rubens and other artists who influenced him After suffering from gout for many years, Rubens died in Antwerp on May 30, He was buried there in the city church of St. Jacobs.

Arts Peter Paul Rubens: Rubens dominated the 17th-century art world like perhaps no other artist. Rubens depicted this moment in the above painting, "Crown of Thorns," created at an early stage of his career around Biblical stories have fascinated artists of various eras. He had already painted a similar work in on a commission from the future King Charles I of England, who was a passionate admirer of Rubens. In both paintings, the artist wears the fashionable accessories of the time: But Rubens was likewise fascinated by this story from the Old Testament. He finished his own interpretation of the Biblical scene between For this he was condemned to torture: It took Rubens and fellow artist Frans Snyders, who painted the eagle, roughly six years before they finished this masterwork in Here, the hero Hippolytus rejects the love of his stepmother, who subsequently commits suicide " but not before she had claimed that her stepson desired her. The sea god Poseidon commands a sea monster to attack Hippolytus. A major difference between the original work and the copy, however, is the size. Rubens depicts Pan as he unsuccessfully attempts to grab Syrinx, but only manages to capture a fistful of the reeds, which Syrinx will transform into. The reeds were painted by Jan Brueghel the Elder. Titian focused on strong gender contrasts by depicting a dressed, strongly-built warrior opposing a naked and weak woman. The work refers to an old saying of Roman poet Terence. Bereft of the company of Ceres, goddess of grain, and Bacchus, god of wine, poor Venus is freezing " meaning that without bread and wine she starves to death. Venus wraps her little son Cupid in her veil, appearing weak in her total nakedness. The young Prince Paris is faced with a difficult choice: He must decide which of the three goddesses " Athena, Hera or Aphrodite " is the most beautiful one. The messenger god Hermes holds out a golden apple, the prize to be awarded. As a reward, Nike, the goddess of victory, honors Mars with a laurel wreath. Out of jealousy, Athena gave Medusa her hair made of snakes; she feared the beautiful gorgon as a rival and so turned her into a monster. According to Greek mythology, Athena let her be decapitated by Perseus, the son of Zeus.
