By Dyan Branstetter T Frankweiler is a favorite of mine for many reasons. My students love it as well, whether used as a read aloud or in small reciprocal teaching groups. In the story, main character Claudia is bored with the monotony of her life in Connecticut and decides to run away with her younger brother. Eventually, they find their way home with the help of wise Mrs. Here are a few of my favorites: In the book art, characters Claudia and Jamie visit the Arms and Armor exhibit. I invite students to go on an Internet Scavenger Hunt. Click through the online gallery of Arms and Armor. Access the online gallery. Virtual Tour of the Sistine Chapel To help with background information as well as the history of Michelangelo painting the ceiling of the Sistine Chapel, have students check out the chapel itself. Here is a link to a picture. You can still get the effect of the magnitude of this project without zooming in. As a follow-up, have the students paint like Michelangelo. Have students tape a piece of paper to the underside of their desk. Then, students should gather materials and paint while lying on their backs. This will lead to a great discussion about how challenging this process must have been. For students who are curious, here is more detailed information. More Book Art Extensions: Paired reading selections help students better understand the original text and vice versa. Discussing their similarities and differences can help students understand when it is best to use fiction vs. Discussing the different techniques authors use for each genre is also beneficial for student understanding. My students love realizing that this is the same setting as From the Mixed-Up Files€, and it is a fun comparison since the books are fiction, yet different genres and styles.

Summary[edit] The prologue is a letter from Mrs. Frankweiler, addressed "To my lawyer, Saxonberg", accompanied by a drawing of her writing at her office desk. It serves as the cover letter for the page narrative, and provides background for changes to her last will and testament. She chooses Jamie as her companion partly because he has saved all his money. With the help of an unused adult train fare card that she found in a wastebasket, Claudia finds a way to get to the museum for free using the commuter train and a very long walk. Early chapters depict Claudia and Jamie settling in at the Met: A new exhibit draws sensational crowds and fascinates the children: It was purchased at auction, for only a few hundred dollars, from Mrs. Frankweiler, a collector who recently closed her showcase Manhattan residence. The children research it on site and at the Donnell Library , and give their conclusion to the museum staff anonymously. After learning they have been naive, the children spend the last of their money on travel to Mrs. She recognizes them as runaways but sets them briefly to the task of researching the angel from files in her long bank of cabinets. Frankweiler has purposefully "given away" a virtually priceless Michelangelo to the Met. In exchange for a full account of their adventure, she will leave the crucial file to them in her will, and send them home in her Rolls-Royce. Claudia learns her deep motive for persisting in the crazy search: Frankweiler may get "grandchildren" who delight her. Her lawyer gets a luncheon date at the Met, to revise her will. Characters[edit] The Kincaids live in Greenwich, Connecticut. Frankweiler lives on a "country estate" in Farmington, Connecticut , closer to Hartford. Claudia Kincaid, 11, is the oldest of four children and the only girl, so she both sets the table and empties the dishwasher. She is a straight-A sixth grade student, a critic of English grammar , and a good planner, except about money in which she spends largely on sweets. She feels unappreciated at home, plans to run away with her brother Jamie, and recruits him. They run to the Metropolitan Museum and there discover a mystery of the art world, which fascinates her and overwhelms the adventure. Jamie Kincaid, 9, is the third child and the middle boy, in fourth grade, quiet and frugal. He complements his sister perfectly: He cheats at the card game War , playing with his best friend for money on the school bus daily. Frankweiler, 82, is smart, insightful, eccentric, and rich. She is the narrator , telling the story of Claudia and Jamie Kincaid to her attorney. She inferred that if they ever ran away "[t]hey would certainly never consider any place less elegant than the Metropolitan Museum of Art". Konigsburg gathered in a private space at the Metropolitan Museum of Art to pay tribute to the author, who died on April 19, at age He told a story. On one such occasion, Paul recalled, his mother spotted a single piece of popcorn on the floor next to an ornate piece of royal furniture, which was completely blocked off from public access. He remembers his mother wondering aloud, where did that popcorn come from? And it was that moment, "burned into shrapnel memory", that he believes formed the kernel of the story that would become From the Mixed-Up Files of Mrs. She was "a very special lady", he said, whose passion for art drew her to this "very special place". The page one story was published Tuesday, concerning a Friday auction. Reproduced in Junior Reference Collection.
