Considering a cabin also contains more options than you might think. Just as everyone has their own favorite candy choice when presented with a chocolate sampler, our range of possible cabins offers a lot of variety. Here are a few to consider. They have cute little cabins on their own five-acre property, perfect for a day spent cross-country skiing or snowshoeing. Also available is the five bedroom lodge with two porches and plenty of room for people. Craving more winter action? It is a mere 6. There is a fire circle with free firewood and a gas barbecue grill for guests. Wildlife abounds on the property. The owner is an Adirondack Guide who offers his thirty years of experience as a unique concierge service. Ask about a custom adventure. The lake is lovely any time of year, a vista of water, forest, and mountains. Both cottages have been recently renovated and include maid service and discounted ski tickets. Revel in the views of Lake Placid and Whiteface Mountain from the living room, full kitchen, and two of the bedrooms. Full sidewalks, plowed by the miniature sidewalk snowplow, let you reach the abundant local dining or go for a sunny stroll to the downtown shops and restaurants, only a half mile away. At the Mallard Cottage, you can see the fireplace from the kitchen, living room, or loft bedroom. The French doors in the living room open to the front porch, Lake Placid, and a beautiful meditation pool. Perfect for those who like to experience timeless nature from polished surroundings. Your own lodge For a one-of-a-kind experience, there are the extraordinary guest cabins at Lake Placid Lodge. Choose from 17 slightly different ones, all with their own individual charms. Each one was designed and furnished with hand-crafted details as well as enchanting views. Choose from those only steps from the water, or a group focusing on splendid bathrooms, with soaking tubs and walk-in showers. Share a two bedroom cabin or revel in privacy in a secluded one-room suite with a hand-built king feather bed, a two-person jetted tub, dry sauna, and a steam shower. Guests have free use of cross-country skis, snowshoes, and toboggans in winter. There is also the option of arranging a private meal in the Wine Cellar. There are also billiards, backgammon, chess, cards, a reading library, and many fires to gaze into. All of these fine Adirondack traditions are still only minutes away from Lake Placid, Whiteface Mountain, and our other winter attractions. It just feels far away from everything. Whatever your own combination of access, gorgeous nature, and plenty of room or small enough for only two, Lake Placid can make those cabin dreams come true. Explore all the possible cabins and cottages. Come into town for a fine meal.

Chapter 2 : Bruce Wadsworth (Author of An Adirondack Sampler)

Mark your calendars because one of New York state's most exciting fairs is coming to town. Beginning on Friday, August 3, Malone will host the th annual Franklin County Fair, a regional celebration of farming and all things fun.

Friday, July 10, Adirondack Sampler During a week in the Adirondacks, I was able to explore three diverse streams and enjoy a hike up Snowy Mountain with the family. The three streams differed in their tannin levels, gradient and geology. Many may not realize the Adirondack hemlocks were sought out, felled and stripped of their bark to supply the local tanneries. Streams that traverse these hemlock stands often are dark and stained. A rain swollen stream The first stream explored has crystal clear water and runs over the reddish rock of the Canadian Shield. The day I visited the stream was quite high from several days of rain. This meant that much of the stream would not be accessible since the high flow precluded hoping from boulder to boulder to fish both sides. With a little work, I was able to find some areas that were fish-able and where brook trout were willing to come up and chase a Royal Wulff. Several times I could see the back and orange flanks of a brook trout rise up out of the turbulent water. One fish was particular entertaining to watch come up clear out of the water jumping over the Royal Wulff without connecting. After several attempts to hook the fish, I switched to a yellow neversink caddis since I had noticed a few small yellow stoneflies in the air and this fly the fish took with abandon. White Campanion blooming along the banks This fish came back for the yellow neversink caddis The next day was clear and cool, a perfect day for hiking! The family decided that we would climb Snowy mountain which is an 8 mile loop with about a vertical ascent. It was a gorgeous day for a hike and the views from the fire tower were certainly worth the effort. With all the recent rain the trail was more like a small river with water running everywhere and several challenging stream crossings. The amazing view north toward the High Peaks from Snowy mountain The following day I met Todd to fish the high gradient tannin stained stream in the previous post. The reader may be interested in comparing the distinct coloration of the brook trout from each of these streams. The second stream visited was a moderate gradient stream. This stream was also a lot higher then I usually see it and it was a pleasure fish it with such a good current. Several brook trout were brought to hand from the likely places indicating that the stream has wintered well. A favorite spot I never pass by without running a fly under the tree My final outing was a revisit to the first stream several days after the rains. The flows were more moderate and I was able to navigate the rocks to fish more of the stream. I started out with the Royal Wulff but after watching a couple fish look over the fly and return to the bottom, I switched to an Ausable Bomber, reasoning that a more naturally colored fly would do better under these conditions. The Ausable Bomber brought several nicely colored brook trout to the surface and then to my hands to be photographed and returned to the water. Crystal clear water running over the ledges typical of the Canadian Shield Notice the lighter coloring on these fish This day the Ausable Bomber was the ticket Posted by.
