His father Henry was a physician, one of the few certified medical professionals on the frontier. He served briefly in a Texas regiment of the Confederate Army, but saw little or no action and never left the state. After the war he returned to Clarksville and opened a law practice. Income from the practice enabled him to make small loans and buy Red River county warrants at a fraction of their face value during the depression of the s. Those warrants regained their value after the depression and nearly overnight made William McDonald wealthy. Sensing he was in the wrong business, he abandoned legal practice and moved to Paris to become a full time banker. The banks proved successful and made McDonald a very wealthy man. He lived most of his life in Paris, but traveled extensively. Other than his banking career, he had numerous side interests, including literature, botany, geography, and most important for this discussion, astronomy. McDonald never married and had no children. The rest and residue of his estate he gave, in trust, to the University of Texas for the specific purpose of establishing an astronomical observatory. William McDonald died February 6, , nine months after making the will, at the age of 81 years. The will was admitted to probate in the county court of Lamar County, and later, after a contest and appeal, in the District Court. Seven heirs contested the will, alleging that McDonald did not have testamentary capacity at the time of execution. They generally denied the application and specially pleaded as follows: McDonald, deceased, did not have testamentary capacity to make a will; was of unsound mind; and did not have mental capacity to know, understand, and appreciate the character, amount, and extent of his property or the objects of his bounty, or the real disposition he was making, or attempting to make, of his property by the instrument offered for probate. McDonald have testamentary capacity on May 8, , at the time he executed the will in controversy? By testamentary capacity is meant that the person at the time of the execution of the will has sufficient mental ability to understand the business in which he is engaged, the effect of his act in making the will, and the general nature and extent of his property. He must also be able to know his next of kin and the natural objects of his bounty. He must have memory sufficient to collect in his mind the elements of the business to be transacted and to hold them long enough to perceive at least their obvious relation to each other, and to be able to form a reasonable judgment as to them. An insane delusion is the belief of the existence of a state of supposed facts which no rational person would have believed. Upon appeal, the Texarkana Court of Civil Appeals affirmed. We conclude the evidence is ample and greatly preponderates in support of the jury verdict, arrived at under proper and complete and duly approved instructions. At most that was the force and effect of the spoken words of the mere chance conversation, even though couched in language extravagant or facetious. The same specific bequest appeared in the first will in and was inserted in each of the five other wills made respectively during the ten years to . The fact that the testator supervised his own large estate wisely and prudently during the times of these wills until the date of the will in suit opposes an inference that he was of an irrational mind to a degree to incapacitate him from making the will and disposing of his property as he did. From to , the Supreme Court consisted of three Justices. It was assisted by a Commission of Appeals that comprised two sections each having three Commissioners. With the consent of the parties to a suit, the Court would assign some petitions for writs of error Section A or Section B of the Commission. The Court granted a writ of error and assigned hearing and consideration to Section B. The Commission considered the contested question of whether the evidence presented raised the issue of insane delusions. If so, it opined, it was necessary to giving of the requested jury instruction the trial court declined to give. The Commission considered the testimony and concluded, and the Court concurred, that the evidence did raise the issue. Thus, the trial court and the Court of Civil Appeals erred in holding to the contrary. Commissioner Speer wrote an opinion reversing the Court of Civil Appeals. In other words, the real defense is want of testamentary capacity, whether such want of capacity is produced by ordinary and complete insanity, or by temporary aberrations or insane delusions. The real vice, from a judicial standpoint, in either case that vitiates the instrument, is want of capacity. So that, where want of capacity is pleaded as ground of contest, though general in the form of its expression, nevertheless that mental defect may be proven in any of the ways recognized by the law of evidence. Witt, a practicing physician, and a specialist in nervous and mental diseases, together with his answer, will show conclusively, we think, that the issue of want of mental capacity through insane delusions was raised by the testimony. The hypothetical question finds support in the statement of the evidence. Re-trial of the case commenced in Paris in late October. The evidence was more or less the same as in the previous trial, but there was more of it. Several witnesses testified that they heard McDonald talk about looking into heaven and there were arguments on whether he meant Heaven or the heavens. There are several appeals to the presumably fundamentalist religious beliefs of some jury members. McDonald suffered from an insane delusion about the gates of heaven, that does not believe in the Bible and is no fit place to send Boys and Girls. It hung ten in favor of the will, and two against. After solving several logistical problems, the McDonald Observatory, on a mountain near Fort Davis, Texas, became a reality.
