The sky was still overcast, and the wet bushes were unavoidable. The sky and the sea were almost of the same color, and that not a beautiful one. The sky was now clear, the air frosty, and my rags were but a scant protection to me.

Jay Michaelson is a poet of multitudes. His gift is not just his enviable ability attain the poetic voice very much his own, but also the skill to use this voice in poems that are quite different from each other and can speak on different levels at once. This skill to do many different things well is, I believe, quite rare in poetry of the generation to which this poet belongs. Michaelson sustains an intimate tonality that frames even obtuse sketches of people and place, but always with economy and concrete imagery. Kabbalah, Mindfulness and Embodied Spiritual Practice. Some of his relationship poetry is whisperingly erotic without any mechanical literary devices, or predictable explicitness. The Uses and Limits of Theology. You are sweating, you are dancing, your breath stinks of vodka, Your white shirt is plastered to your chest, Its buttons are partly undone, You look like an entrant in a Yeshivish wet t-shirt contest. The poem is wry and startling, deliciously grounded in physical detail, and very, very Jewish. Seeing a beautiful body is one thing; visually eavesdropping on a conversation with the Infinite is another. The poem gives a whole new cast to questions of boundaries and transgression. It knocks me flat. A different subset of poems would give you a different impression of the collection. Poems with long lines. When I see the word Israel.
