Washington Allston was born in South Carolina in 1793. After graduating from Harvard College in 1812, he returned to Charleston and sold his share of the family property to finance his career as an artist. In May 1813 Allston and the miniaturist painter Edward G. Malbone left for England. He learned the use of under painting and glazes to produce the rich atmospheric effect necessary to the realization of his later romantic paintings. He appreciated the bravura of their technique and the resonance of their tone which, he later wrote, moved not only his senses but his imagination. He tried to emulate these qualities in his own grandiose historical and literary paintings and his landscapes and seascapes, such as the Rising of a Thunderstorm at Sea. Allston returned to America in 1815 and stayed in Boston, occupying the very room that the painters John Copley and John Trumbull had used. During this period he married and did many portraits of his family and friends, such as the soft, languorous portrait of William Ellery Channing, as well as humorous genre scenes. In 1816 he sailed with his wife and Samuel F. Morse for England, where his wife died in 1817. Among the paintings of this second English period were the Angel Releasing St. American Period. Allston returned to America in 1818 where he would remain for the rest of his life, residing in Boston but spending much time in Cambridge. His friends at this time included the portrait painter Thomas Sully and the sculptor Horatio Greenough. In 1820 Allston married Martha R. Dana, the sister of the novelist Richard H. Dana. The couple settled in Cambridgeport, Mass. Allston continued to lead a rather rarefied existence: Times had changed in the United States, and Allston felt out of place. His old confidence was gone. The literati—people like Ralph Waldo Emerson and Dana—admired his work, but to the public he meant nothing. In America, portraiture and, to some extent, landscape were all that most people cared for. In Europe, Allston had painted scenes of either a dramatically bizarre or a sweetly joyous nature. In Europe he had pandered more openly to the emotions, liking especially themes of supernatural salvation; his American paintings are usually more intimate and smaller in scale than those done in Europe. Allston painted from memory several Italian landscapes, the most memorable being Moonlight Landscape; with four mysterious figures in the foreground, it casts a quietly eerie spell. Allston was preparing to work on the figure of the King on the day of his death. He made frequent use of his literary background and interests in his painting: Allston knew the Old and New Testaments well and sometimes chose to depict obscure passages, such as the Dead Man Revived from the account of 2 Kings, chapter 4. The most important of his writings, Lectures on Art, published posthumously in 1827 but neglected until the early 20th century, set forth a theory of art as creation and imagination and dealt systematically with such abstruse topics as invention and originality.

Washington Allston: Washington Allston, painter and author, commonly held to be the first important American Romantic painter. Allston is known for his experiments with dramatic subject matter and his use of light and atmospheric colour.

He was well known during his lifetime for his experiments with dramatic subject matter and his bold use of light and atmospheric color. His mother Rachel Moore had married Captain William Allston in 1783, though her husband died in 1795, shortly after the Battle of Cowpens. The South in American Literature: Duke University Press, Moore remarried to Dr. Flagg, the son of a wealthy shipping merchant from Newport, Rhode Island. Named in honor of the leading American general of the Revolution, Washington Allston graduated from Harvard College in 1800 and moved to Charleston, South Carolina for a short time before sailing to England in May 1802. From 1802 to 1805, he visited the great museums of Paris and then, for several years, those of Italy, where he met Washington Irving in Rome. Burstein, Andrew. The Life of Washington Irving. ISBN 0-393-00111-1 and Coleridge, his lifelong friend. After traveling throughout western Europe, Allston finally settled in London, where he won fame and prizes for his pictures. Allston was also a published writer. His wife died in February 1805, leaving him saddened, lonely, and homesick for America. In 1806, he returned to the United States and lived in Cambridge, Massachusetts, for twenty-five years. He was the uncle of the artists George Whiting Flagg and Jared Bradley Flagg, both of whom studied painting under him. In 1807, he published Monaldi, a romance illustrating Italian life, and in 1808, a volume of his Lectures on Art, and Poems. Allston died on July 9, 1843, at age 40. Allston was sometimes called the "American Titian" because his style resembled the great Venetian Renaissance artists in their display of dramatic color contrasts. His work greatly influenced the development of U.S. Also, the themes of many of his paintings were drawn from literature, especially Biblical stories. His artistic genius was much admired by Samuel Taylor Coleridge, and Ralph Waldo Emerson was strongly influenced by his paintings and poems, but so were both Margaret Fuller and Sophia Peabody, wife of Nathaniel Hawthorne. I never pass through Cambridge Port without thinking of Allston. His memory is the quince in the drawer and perfumes the atmosphere.

The most important of his writings, Lectures on Art, published posthumously in 1809 but neglected until the early 20th century, set forth a theory of art as creation and imagination and dealt systematically with such abstruse topics as invention and originality. He did this not only in a general way by extending the scope of painting beyond the bounds of portraiture but also by originating certain fashions and propounding ideas that were continued. For example, the scene of the tiny figure dwarfed pictorially by the grandeur and vastness of nature Elijah Being Fed by the Ravens, was taken up by many painters of the later Hudson River school. Most specifically, Allston was the first American painter to draw more from the workings of his personal inner vision than from external reality. In the 19th century alone, he was the forebear of such painters as John Quidor and Albert P. Richardson and Henry W. A. Study of the Romantic Artist in America, is a catalogue of the existing and recorded paintings by Allston. See also Oliver W. Larkin, Art and Life in America; rev. Allston is bordered on the east and north by the Charles River ; and the City of Cambridge is accessible via several bridges. It extends westward to Everett Street and eastward to the Charles River. Allston claims to be the only community in America named for an artist. Unlike the rest of Allston, Lower Allston has far fewer students. The neighborhood is very quiet, has extremely low crime,[ citation needed ] and is an easy walk to Allston Village or Harvard Square. In , Harvard began building again, has completed two new buildings and is starting on the new, state-of-the-art Paulson School of Engineering and Applied Sciences on Western Avenue west of Allston Square by the Charles River. Later, it will begin construction of the "Gateway" building on the northeast corner of Allston Square. In a new railroad depot for the Boston and Albany Railroad opened. The Town of Brighton was annexed by the City of Boston in Henry Wadsworth Longfellow owned several properties in Allston. In the wooden depot was replaced by the station depicted at the right. Stockyards and a large abattoir operated nearby in the northern part of Brighton. Much of the railroad yard remains in use today as the CSX Transportation Beacon Park Yard, but all livestock activity ended by the midth century. CSX plans to move its yard operation west, allowing the plot to be redeveloped by Harvard. Only a Toyota dealer and a Vespa dealer remain, but the windowed buildings along the eastern end of Brighton Avenue reflect this history. The Massachusetts Turnpike Extension, built largely on part of the Boston and Albany right-of-way, opened through Allston in and Harvard Avenue hosts a number of furniture stores, thrift shops, and stores that offer items for resale, due to the large student body and high residential turnover. The section of the neighborhood that lies immediately south of the turnpike and centers on the stretch of Harvard Avenue between Commonwealth Avenue and Cambridge Street also houses many shops, bars, and restaurants. Recent business promotion initiatives have dubbed this area "Allston Village. The renters who are leaving put their unwanted possessions out in the streets for those who may want the items, which include couches, tables, kitchenware and clothing.
