The wining, however, is well underway! Temperatures have been close, but not quite as hot, and the cooler days have been a little more frequent than usual as well. While the Pinot Noir left appear to be developing into larger berries in tighter clusters, the Cabernet Franc centre and other Bordeaux varieties appear to be slightly smaller berries with looser clusters, which should have an impact on the intensity of the final wines. At Tawse we started picking on September 14, and picked a few tons for four days for sparkling wines, where we want higher acidity and lower sugar levels but have decided to pause for a few days to let the grapes ripen a little more. Just a tractorful of berries makes the harvest start in the most delightful way. As long as the sunny days continue, the rest of the harvest should come in nicely. Up on the Bench local shorthand for the Niagara Escarpment, many of the wineries are also on pause like us or proceeding slowly with sparkling. Down on the plains, however, the harvest is in full swing for hybrid and volume grapes in particular. At the Molek Farm, the machine harvester is collecting a white hybrid called Geisenheim upper right, which will be sold to a bigger winery. Here hybrids are typically used for volume wines. On this farm, volume grapes are pruned to six canes left – there are 3 levels of grapes: They have big bunches, and the vines receive little trimming canopy management during the season, so look a little wild. These grapes lower right may be Riesling, or some close relative, as I think I see the signature brown speckling of ripe Riesling berries. Unlike the press I was used to last year in Alsace left where the grapes are squeezed in a mostly sealed-off environment, the presses at Tawse centre expose grapes to oxygen during the crush see the slits on the side; a different style of vinification. Off the crush pad, the new French barrels are also coming in – one of my jobs is to number and brand them with the Tawse logo. OK, I guess I can see why people think wine is complicated. The house that brews together stays glued together: This week – Belgian IPA! But of course this idyllic calm comes to a close all too quickly. Visited 93 times, 94 visits today Share this:

I should also mention that you will not be going anywhere near the actual "top of Troll Falls" on this trail. You will not be above Troll Falls, looking over the edge. Your objective is the Upper Falls, a completely different set of waterfalls. We started at the Stoney Trailhead below Kananaskis Village. From the Stoney Trailhead, the Alberta Parks website says it is a short 1. It was also a blissfully short hike to the final junction with the falls and the hike in did not take very long. First, there are signs near the falls guiding you on a "new" trail to view the Upper Falls. There are two of these signs and you can follow either one because the trails join up within a few minutes. Please read the yellow sign below as well and judge for yourself if this trail is suitable for your family. It is not an official trail and it is not completely without risk. Second, Alberta Parks has constructed a wooden hand railing alongside the climb up to the ledge under Troll Falls. A new wooden hand railing helps hikers get up on the ledge where my son is standing Highlights of a visit to Troll Falls: The "rock troll" is shown in the photo below. This trail has an actual plank bridge. Crossing the creek at Troll Falls to start our hike up to the Upper Falls Once on the other side, we followed blue sign posts, wooden signs for the Upper Falls, and orange flagging on a rough trail that will become more well defined as it gets more foot traffic. At present, the trail is pretty faint in spots and we appreciated the blue sign posts. Lunch beside Marmot Creek This set of falls was pretty small basically just water running down through a steep canyon but we enjoyed a lovely lunch sitting on rock slabs above the creek here. Boulder Falls passes through this rocky canyon And a word of caution here for parents with young kids: We kept a close eye on our children here even though they are a bit older. As you can see in the photo above, a fall into this canyon would not end well. Not a bad spot for a lunch break! Reaching the Upper Falls and the End of the Trail We pulled out our hiking guidebook again and discovered that this third set of waterfalls was also known as "Double Falls. This is the lower section of the Upper Falls The Upper Section of the Upper Falls We found these waterfalls to be quite gorgeous and could have spent a while taking photos here. We heeded the advice and turned around at this point. Somehow though we missed these falls on the way up so had to pay a bit of attention to find them on the way down. On your way up from Troll Falls, look for a small tipi in the forest and listen for the sound of crashing water. The trail down is close to there. Look for a faint steep trail leading down to the creek before you reach Boulder Falls mentioned above. When we were here, one of the blue sign posts on the main trail was knocked over. The trail down to Marmot Falls was right at the knocked over sign post. Why you want to find Marmot Falls: The trail down is very steep. There is a canyon right near the falls and a fall would not end well. Underneath Marmot Falls Hiking out Via the Hay Meadow Trail We returned to the Troll Falls trail and rather than return straight back down the trail to the parking lot, we decided to do the Hay Meadow extension which adds maybe a half kilometre at the very most. The kids enjoyed playing by the river and I always find it very pretty down by the Kananaskis River. This map shows the Hay Meadow Trail on it as well. The trail was still in excellent shape with no snow on the first weekend of November. There was a tiny bit of ice around Troll Falls, but other than that we had no need for ice cleats. You might even need snowshoes if you go above Troll Falls this winter. And total time it took our gang for this hike was roughly 3 hours at a very relaxed pace, stopping lots to play. Check this hike out with your family!
