January 29, Want to turn your munchkin into a future mathlete? Neighborhoods are full of numbers on mailboxes, curbs, doorways, and signs. The next time you head out for a stroll, keep your eyes peeled for numbers and take turns calling them out. You can even boost the smart quotient of this number activity by tacking on a counting rule: Once you find a number, you have to count up to that number, whether you count trees, cars, dogs, or telephone poles. How much do kids love playing with other kids? Let them count the ways! While a friend or older sibling hides, help your little one count to ten. For older preschoolers, draw a hopscotch course on your driveway for a number activity that tests both large-motor skills and counting prowess. Or for something quieter, try a round of Hi-Ho! Cherry-O, the classic board game that has kids counting cherries into baskets. Cleaning by the numbers. Use the few minutes to stimulate some math mastery. For example, encourage your critter to guess with you which playthings represent the largest portion of the mess. Are there more Legos? Then count up the toys as you go and see who guessed right. For an older preschooler, work together to make a chart of his favorite toys action figures, books, cars, stuffed animals and keep a running tally of what shows up most at clean-up time. Little ones love nursery rhymes, so introduce yours to some that involve numbers and counting. Some of these songs are good practice in counting backward. Write the numbers one through 12 in the bottom of paper cupcake liners, then help your child count out the right number of small crackers or cereal pieces into each. This game not only makes for good counting practice, but it adds a tactile dimension that makes learning stick. An older kid can try counting backward as the snacks disappear in his mouth: Four, three, two, one—'all gone! This number activity will help your little one associate the sounds of the numbers with their appearance — and that could help her out of a scary situation. The Count would approve of this toddler art project: Make a homemade number-activity coloring book by drawing the outlines of the numbers one through ten on a large pad of paper. Working together, take turns announcing your coloring picks:
