You Be The Banker by Mark Skousen If credit risk bothers you less than interest rate risk, consider owning a prime rate fund. Two rules of thumb on buying closed-end funds, elucidated elsewhere in this survey, have to do with the cost of ownership. One is that you should almost never pay a premium over net asset value to get a closed-end. The other is that you should be wary of a fund that has a higher than normal expense ratio. The story on page sets out the reasoning for these rules. These are portfolios of bank loans, held by closed-end funds. First, why diversify into this class of funds? Since bonds have been on a tear. Yields on year Treasuries have slid to a measly 5. How, then, to get a decent yield without taking on long-term interest rate risk? Prime rate funds invest in variable-rate senior loans to corporations at interest rates tied to the so-called prime rate. That is several percentage points higher than the yield on Treasuries, mortgage paper or money market instruments like certificates of deposit. Even after charging stiff fees of 1. Although the net asset value of the funds is not completely unchanging, like that of money market funds, the fluctuations to date have been minuscule. Your fund, to a degree, is acting more like a bank than a bond fund. What happens when interest rates shoot up and bond prices fall? Conventional bond funds get hammered, but the prime rate funds, whose interest income floats up with the prime rate, have been remarkably stable. In , when investors suffered terrible capital losses on longterm bonds, Pilgrim America Prime Rate Trust enjoyed a stable net asset value and delivered more than 7. For one, declining interest income if the prime rate declines. The senior loans are collateralized and go to respectable borrowers, but there are no government guarantees. Two funds trade publicly, but the rest are redeemable only quarterly. You buy at net asset value. A brand-new sister fund, Van Kampen Senior Income Fund, will use leverage and deliver a slightly better yield. Senior Income trades publicly as a closed-end and is currently at a slight premium. Pilgrim can play tough. In shareholders were dismayed by a rights issue that forced them to either add to their holdings or risk dilution. Emerging Markets Floating Rate Fund is for the brave. This one invests in floating-rate loans to governments in Latin America, eastern Europe, Asia and Africa.

The media are congratulating him for his putative "courage. This is all baloney. In a former life I was a trustee of the Social Security trust fund. So let me set the record straight. Until last year Social Security took in more payroll taxes than it paid out in benefits. It lent the surpluses to the rest of the government. Now that Social Security has started to pay out more than it takes in, Social Security can simply collect what the rest of the government owes it. This will keep it fully solvent for the next 26 years. But why should there even be a problem 26 years from now? It fairly accurately predicted how quickly the boomers would age. It had a pretty good idea of how fast the US economy would grow. To the contrary, most new immigrants are young and their payroll-tax contributions will far exceed what they draw from Social Security for decades. Remember, the Social Security payroll tax applies only to earnings up to a certain ceiling. The ceiling rises every year according to a formula roughly matching inflation. Back in , the ceiling was set so the Social Security payroll tax would hit 90 percent of all wages covered by Social Security. The Commission assumed that, as the ceiling rose with inflation, the Social Security payroll tax would continue to hit 90 percent of total income. Today, though, the Social Security payroll tax hits only about 84 percent of total income. It went from 90 percent to 84 percent because a larger and larger portion of total income has gone to the top. In , the richest 1 percent of Americans got Today the top 1 percent takes in more than 20 percent. The logical response to the increasing concentration of income at the top is simply to raise the ceiling. Robert Reich is the author of Aftershock: This post originally appeared at RobertReich.

Background[ edit ] In the s, Cook was notorious for paid radio programs which he used to market investment seminars. He claimed he could teach people to double their money every 2. The government forced him to recant that claim. Cook is a proponent of rolling stocks stocks that regularly vacillate between "predictable" highs and lows and has been very vocal about stock splits being a good way to make money, claiming that many stocks rose post split since the end of the s bull market, Cook has not been as strong a proponent of this concept. One of his more famous phrases was meter drop. Cook said that as a cab driver he learned that money was made every time the meter dropped, and that it was better to take many small fares rather than one big one. The stock now trades on the pink sheets for around "a penny a share". He has continued writing books and launched a multi-level investment program. Wade Cook is a member of The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints and has been known to use references to religion in his writings and presentations. Two companies he controlled, American Business Alliance and Monarch Funding Corporation, also went bankrupt that year. The following year, the Arizona Attorney General charged him with several criminal counts, including selling unregistered shares of a company he controlled. Robbins agreed that he had read the book and met with Cook, but disputed the illegality of his use of the concepts. The bulletin board often recommended the securities of obscure corporations or options in which there was a fairly small market. Unfortunately, the increase in the value of the securities was often short-lived; since the price would be driven back down as students began to sell their positions. If most of the activity in the recommended securities was due to transactions by bulletin board subscribers, it is reasonable to conclude that at least some of these investment recommendations would become self-fulfilling prophesies. On October 5, , Wade Cook Financial Corporation agreed to a settlement with the Federal Trade Commission and 14 state Attorneys General on charges that the corporation misrepresented earnings potential. As a result, WCFC was required to set up redress program for consumers who purchased its products and to alter its advertised earnings claims. Bankruptcy Judge Thomas Glover ordered the company liquidated on January 18, , for failure to provide testimony creditors had requested. He named it after himself. His sentencing was set for June 22,
