Chapter 2 : Lists That Contain Bedtime Kiss For Little Fish by Lorie Ann Grover

With calming text and smooth illustrations, this board book is perfect for every sleepy-eyed little fish. Get ready for bed with the shark and the octopus, and let the ocean lull you to sleep. Time for sleep in the deep, deep, deep.

This is your chance to get out in the woods. Anyway, he was a fellow from Quebec mom knew. Now he stared at his woodland surroundings. Scotch thistles kept trying to tear his skin apart. And deer flies dive-bombed his head. James was sure the mosquitoes must have taken most of his spare blood. Why did he agree to come anyways? Besides, he was tired of people feeling sorry for him, because dad died a few months ago. James sure missed him. As he stood up a twig tried to scratch his eye out. And his jeans were damp. The man told him early morning dew is never dry. James was really smart for his age, but not smart enough to figure out a good excuse to stay home. James cringed as he moved to the edge of this rocky ridge. Almost felt like being at the top of an avalanche with danger waiting below. The man below looked like a midget. How did he make it down there? Maybe he had a parachute. But he was afraid. No so long ago he fell off a ladder trying to get their cat from up a tree. Dad said to wait. His back end still felt sore thinking about it. The man came up part way and guided James down the slippery shale all the way to the Debert River shore. It was a magnificent view seeing where the narrow waterway wore a path through the rocky cliff. Their eyes feasted on the current as its movement tumbled down and down until it disappeared around a corner. Not one little bit. Keep your old worms. Why did you bring me here anyways? Even after all the mean things James had said. This was the second time today he had apologized. If mom were here, she would have fainted. His blond hair blew lazily in the wind. Dad should be here, not this stranger. His floppy hat brim swept up and down from the wind. Then James was alone. He looked at the river. Not bad, first try. After awhile it got boring. What do you do for an encore after wrist-shooting about 25 flat stones? James watched a crow flapping upwards to a crevice in the cliff. The other side must be almost a hundred feet up, he figured. Indeed, it was mostly full of little waterfalls, where the current bumped and scraped over boulders sending splashes of white into the air. He had to admit it looked awesome. A squirrel raced along the bank towards him. Stopping suddenly it ripped off in the opposite direction. In fact, the boy was the one who was nervous. James was fearful of swimming in water over his head, yet felt comfortable by this river. He was also nervous about climbing any high places, such as hiking in the wild woods. It was something dad could not understand. Mom must have told Mr. Is that why his neighbor brought him to this remote place? All his thinking caused the boy to be sleepy. He laid his head on the nearest soft rock, and closed his eyes. Ah, just for a moment. Sunshine was soothing and the scent of wild roses bathed the sleeping child. James dreamed mom was giving him a goodnight kiss. James thought about dad. He missed him so much. If only he were here. Time seemed to stand still as images and memories danced in his mind. Suddenly, James opened his eyes. James felt so rested. As his eyes began to focus he saw a man coming towards him. He recognized the glasses and floppy hat. It had fallen asleep after being used as a pillow. And the bug juice Mr. They rested on a fallen tree aside the shore. James absorbed tales of animals seen in the forest. James knew they should be respected and protected. He gasped as a whitetail deer leaped over some driftwood, a short distance away. The animal seemed to float through the air. As the afternoon slowly moved along, James felt relaxed. Maybe this was a magic place like Mr. The man nodded and walked a short distance away, giving the boy some privacy. James saw how easily the man cast his fishing line out. Must have had lots of practice he thought. James wondered if he could ever be like Mr. And not having to be the fastest runner on the block to escape bullies. James wished he could cast like Mr. Even learn how to swim. It would be great not to be afraid of everything. Maybe his neighbor might teach him how to be braver? It felt good running through the shallow part of the river by himself. Water exploded in all directions as he rushed forward. Just before reaching the waiting man, something made him stop and turn. Looking back, he sensed someone watching. Yes, he was sure of it, an outline of a face in the clouds. He knew it was dad. And he was smiling. There are many children living without one parent and our stories deal with similar issues.
