Bonfire by Krysten Ritter is a Crown Archetype publication. A heavily atmospheric and absorbing crime story-When environmental lawyer, Abby Williams returns to.

Krysten Ritter June 26, The following is an exclusive excerpt from the paperback release of Bonfire, by Krysten Ritter, a tale of mysterious illness and environmental degradation in a small town. Senior year, Misha and Kaycee started getting sick. Their hands shookâ€”that was one of the first symptoms. Cora Allen and Annie Baum came next. They would lose their balance even when they were standing still. They forgot where their classrooms were, or how to get to the gym. And it was like the whole town got sick, too, like Barrens spiraled down into the darkness with them. All just because they felt like it. And all of it? Because they wanted attention. For a few months, they were famous, at least in Southern Indiana. Poor, neglected, small-town girls. Someone from the Chicago Tribune was trying to link the sickness to other examples of corporate pollution. When the girls came out as liars, though, the story fizzled quickly, and no one seemed to blame them, at least not for long. They just wanted a little attention. But I believed them. Article continues after advertisement When I moved to Chicago, I tossed all my old clothes as soon as I could afford to replace them. I traded in my style, such as it was, for whatever was draped on the mannequins on Magnificent Mile. I ran my accent over a blade, sharpening out the long Midwest vowels, and told people I came from a suburb of New York. I slept off my hangover on Sundays, and never prayed unless it was to clear the traffic. And I stopped calling home. I did my best to shake Barrens off. Maybe I wanted to believe there was some answer, some reason, for why she did what she did. No matter how many times I swore I would stop, I found myself coming back to the same questions. Kaycee, Misha, the hoax. Sometimes a month or two would go by. Other times, it was every few weeks. Mostly Optimal PRâ€”new housing, a new community center, a new scholarship fund. All that searching over the years, and it never turned up anything of use. Until, six months ago, it did. Pouring over the minutes, I felt like Alice down her rabbit hole: I made four pages of handwritten notes just by reviewing the minutes. And for the first time in a decade, for the first time in my whole life, maybe, I felt as if the whole world had settled down. I felt as if everything had quieted to whisper the small promise of an answer. There are procedures, protocol, paths meant to take us out of the entanglement of our fears and suspicions. So here I am. Used with the permission of the publisher, Crown Archetype.
