Hale The California Saber-Toothed Cat Smilodon fatalis californicus was an apex, keystone carnivore that lived locally throughout the East Bay during the Pleistocene epoch, from 2. The middle to late Pleistocene was the age of the enormous beasts known as Rancholabrean megafauna, after the famous Rancho La Brea tar pits, which yielded one of the greatest concentrations of diverse fossils. Situated in downtown Los Angeles, its tar-impregnated stream deposits have yielded the remains of 42 mammalian and avian species as well as many other vertebrates, insects, plants, and others. Breck Parkman estimates that perhaps Sabertooths inhabited the Bay Area. The genus Smilodon was named in , based on fossils from Brazil. Three species are recognized today: Smilodon was built more robustly than any extant cat, with particularly well-developed forelimbs and exceptionally long upper canines adapted for precision killing. Unlike modern large cats, Smilodon had a short tail. The front and back limbs were about the same length, with strong retractable claws. The structure of the hyoid bones suggest that Smilodon communicated by roaring, like modern big cats. The coat pattern of Smilodon is unknown, with convincing arguments for plain, spotted and striped patterns. The famously long canines, up to 11 inches long, were slender with fine serrations on the front and back sides. They were more resistant to bending and breaking than round canines. Smilodon's jaw gape is enormous, approaching degrees, compared to around 65 degrees for modern large cats. The gape was necessary for food items to get past the long canine teeth. Analysis of the narrow jaws indicates that it could produce a bite only a third as strong as that of a lion. Smilodon was thought to have killed its prey by holding it still with its forelimbs and biting it. It is unclear in what manner the fatal bite itself was delivered. Most Smilodon fossils are found in sediments from plains or woodland environments. The California Saber-toothed Cat was similar in size and shape to the modern African Lion, with an affinity to similar habitats where it pursued large herbivores like bison, giant ground sloths, horses and mammoths. Tooth wear in fossils suggest Smilodon probably avoided eating bone as it had no bone crushing teeth, and may have associated with large scavengers like hyaenas. Smilodon was most likely an ambush predator that concealed itself in dense vegetation. Its long heel bone suggests it was a good jumper. Exactly how Smilodon killed its prey is debatable. Another hypothesis suggesting Smilodon attacked the belly of its prey has been disputed. There is considerable debate among scientists as to whether Smilodon was a social predator. One study focuses on whether Smilodon was attracted to distress calls of prey. Another study for sociality is based on the healed injuries in Smilodon fossils, which would suggest that the animals needed others to provide food. Neither study offers definitive conclusions. The California Saber-Toothed Cat Smilodon fatalis californicus went extinct around 10, years ago in the Quaternary extinction event. Its extinction has been linked to the decline and extinction of the large herbivores. Whether humans Paleo-Indians killed off the megafauna herbivores that Smilodon relied upon for food, or climactic changes brought about by the end of the last glacial period did them in, or both, the magnificent creatures that had flourished for more than , years some for much longer suddenly died off. In just 1, years, most of them vanished forever.

He decided to call Saber due to the great reviews he saw about the company, and he is happy with his choice. Pasadena, CA "Their people know what they are doing and they guarantee their work. They will stand by it. She was very happy with the results. So happy that when a crack appear in the middle of the floor, and the entire front of the house began to sink, she called us again. This time the problem was a but more serious than sinking concrete. The foundation itself need to lifted and stabilized. That was accomplished with our state-of-the-art foundation underpinning system, designed to restore the structural integrity of foundations by supporting it with steel piles, driven into the ground past the problem soil area and down to a strata that can safely support the weight of the house on the long run. In this video Renee speaks about the entire experience she had with Saber. They will stand by it", says Renee. They were warned about it when they bought their home, but they only realized how bad it was when they actually moved in. Expansive soils swell when they are wet, and shrink during dry periods. That kind of constant soil movement exerts an enormous pressure on foundations that are supported by it. Overtime, floors start to crack, sink or heave, windows and doors begin to stick, and foundation walls may bow or crumble. In this video they talk about the experience with the crew and company. Would they recommend us to their friends? With Saber I can confidently say that", says Karl. They were awesome and very professional. It was a real pleasure. Thank you for allowing us the opportunity to work with your company. If you are ever in our area again, please give us a call.
