Chapter 2 : Chloe Neill - Book Series In Order

*Series also known as: * Vampiri di Chicago [Italian] Spinoff: Heirs of Chicagoland blog.quintoapp.com Some Girl.*

The problems besetting Navarre house have finally been revealed as two of their vampires become attempted assassins in a very public attack. This is one of those hard reviews to write. The writing was well paced, the action seems nicely described. The two main plots were nicely interwoven, related and each got sufficient time and attention to be properly developed and come to a natural conclusion. Merit continues to be a relatively fun character, active and in control without being overwhelming and eclipsing everyone else. There was also more presence from the other women around her, the other female guards, Helen who runs the house, Margot the cook, Mallory her best friend. I also like that Mallory is finally coming from beneath the shadow of her past misdeeds to be a less controversial and dubious presence in the book always haunted by her own guilt I also appreciated that Merit managed to be intelligent and insightful in this book without the need for everyone else to suddenly lose half of their brain cells. It has been an unfortunate habit of the series to make Merit seem extremely intelligent by making everyone else somewhat limited in their comprehension. I do think this book could have been improved by a little more development – Mallory and Catcher want to rejoin the magical organisation – ok, why? What does this organisation actually do? Why is membership an advantage? We have a miscellaneous criminal group doing criminal things – expand on that please. We have a new American Vampire organisation – ok, what does that mean? What does it do? I was starving for some exposition to make me more invested in this book and the world Especially since Merit and Ethan leave this book pretty much as they came in. I can understand not needing to grow a character every book – but this book was so micro-focused on them that it felt like there should have been something Now to some actual issues The first issue I have is that one of the big bads in this book tries to sexually assault Merit. The book does do a good job of showing this as a hard experience for Merit and not something she can just get over, equally it shows Ethan being highly respectful of that and giving her the space she needs. But it remains that we have a sexual assault that added nothing to the book except traumatising Merit for the sake of – of – I actually have no idea. It was just there. It had another minorly irritating side effect – because of woo-woo, Merit ends up having issues with Ethan getting too close to her. The idea that a vampire can fight a human and has a strong edge – but that an edge is all they have – is an interesting one. No, what bemuses me is the lack of political power, specifically the lack of wealth. Why are the vampires so bad with money? Ethan is supposed to be years old. And we have a problem with inclusion. The Chicagoland Vampires series is set, as is pretty obvious, in Chicago a very racially diverse city. This would surprise you reading the books. I think there are two completely nameless POC, one a secretary, one a supplicant for Ethan who we breeze past. This is more glaring because this is book 11 in a series that continues to have very few POC. It also has no LGBT characters – and erasure that has also continued through 11 books and an enormous number of characters In the end, I liked this book. I had no trouble reading it. While nothing made me want to put the book down, there was also nothing compelling me to pick it up once I had put it down. It was good, it was not bad – but that feels like a kind of damning way to praise a book.

Chapter 3 : Chloe Neill - Chicagoland Vampires Series Reading Order - Maryse's Book Blog

Chicagoland Vampires is a series of urban fantasy vampire romance novels by American author Chloe Neill which are set in the city and environs of Chicago.

Chicago, Illinois It was midnight in Chicago, and all was well. It was surrounded by an imposing fence meant to keep our enemies at bay, guarded by men and women who risked their lives to keep the House safe from attack. Tonight, as summer gave way to fall and a cool breeze spilled across the quiet dark, there was peace. Katana at my side, and having finished my patrol of the expansive grounds, I nodded at the guard at the gate and jogged up the stairs to the glowing portico. One final look, one last glance, to ensure quiet in the realm, and then I opened the door. A vampire manned the front desk, and three others—suplicants seeking time with Ethan Sullivan, Master of the House—waited on a bench along one side. There was a flurry of movement and activity because the Master of Cadogan House was getting married tomorrow. A vampire with dark skin and a shaved head rounded the corner into the foyer. He wore a slim-cut dark suit—the official Cadogan House uniform—his skin contrasting vividly with the crisp white shirt and pale green of his eyes. He tracked the room, found me, and walked my way. The CPD had to pull in extra staff to monitor. Chicago, and Cadogan House in particular, seemed to attract it. Their help gave Ethan more time to lead the House, and me more time to ensure its safety. Every eye in the place turned to him, including mine. To the contrary—that he was mine, and I was most assuredly his, made the impact even more forceful. His hair was golden blond and shoulder length, his eyes the green of new emeralds. His jaw was square, his nose straight, his lips usually either quirked in a wicked grin or pulled into a serious line—the expression of a Master with weight on his shoulders. He also wore the Cadogan uniform—a trim black suit that fitted him like the expensive, bespoke garment it probably was. He wore a white button-down beneath, the top button unclasped to show the gleaming silver teardrop of the Cadogan medal that hung at his throat. It was a mark of solidarity, of unity, among the vampires of Cadogan House. And he wore it as well as he did everything else. Beside him was a small woman with tan skin and dark hair. She was a vampire, at least based on the invisible buzz of magic around her. And given the tightness around her eyes, she was a vampire with worries. But when I looked back at Ethan, his gaze was fixed on me. Sentinel, he said through our telepathic connection, taking in the leather and steel of my ensemble. I like the look of you. His smile was just a little bit wicked. Malik and I walked toward him. Lindsey shook her head, mouth tight. Not for lack of trying, Luc never quite got the references right. Probably not entirely unexpected for a century-old vampire. Ethan slid his hands into his pockets, lifted his chin in amusement.

Vampires are the only supernatural beings who have announced their existence to the human public; however, almost all human governing officials know of the remaining supernatural species. Vampires are to swear alliance to their Masters during Commendation ceremonies and from then on are to faithfully serve their Houses and Masters. There are 12 houses in the United States: Cadogan House, founded by Peter Cadogan, is the second oldest and only house in Chicago that still drinks from humans there are two others worldwide. There is also a faction of rogue vampires around the United States who do not have affiliations with any of the Houses; for political purposes, they are represented by Noah Beck. Unlike other vampire series, these vampires become unconscious when the sun rises and not only eat food but crave it. Shapeshifters[edit] Shapeshifters are the supernatural group with the largest numbers over within the United States. They are born with the ability to shift freely from human to animal usually with one specific animal and human form. They are politically organized into packs, four of which exist in the United States. The Central North American Pack is the most notable pack within the series. It is led by Apex Gabriel Keene. Shifters and vampires have a tenuous relationship since the Second Clearings, when shifters purportedly retreated to Alaska, blended in with the Wilderness, and forced the vampires to fight for themselves. Sorcerers and Witches[edit] While all supernaturals contain elements of magic, sorcerers and witches have the ability to harness and manipulate that magic. Their powers are broken down into four classes based on knowledge of the so-called minor and major Keys. They are politically organized under a large union the Order Union of Amalgamated Sorcerers and Spellcasters which is broken down into local chapters. Nymphs[edit] Nymphs are small, slim, busty, doe-eyed, moody females prone to tears and territorial behavior. She is currently the Master of her own house in San Diego. During her time at Cadogan, she was believed to have been involved with Ethan.
