Lawrence had whenever he took up his pen: It is an apparently casual performance that could only come from a poet steeped in his own great talent to the point of taking it for granted, as Wordsworth seems to take for granted the exposition of his verse paragraphs, or Browning a prolonged monologue. Hughes is remorseless in his eye for what is really happening outside in nature at such a time. The cows look out sideways from under their brows which are Their only shelter. The sunk scrubby wood Is a pulverised wreck, rain riddles its holes To the drowned roots. A pheasant looking black In his waterproofs, bends at his job in the stubble. The mid-afternoon dusk soaks into The soaked thickets. Mostly, the statements can afford to be quite plain, and, however plain they are, the poem never loses its mesmeric wet grip, its impact of saturation. Now, down on the farm, it seems exactly equal to the task – as if to tractoring, milking, mucking out, performing these jobs with the wholly effective absence of enthusiasm which for a countryman often seems the nearest thing to enjoyment. But with this rain falling, animals and men could as well be on the Western Front as on a Devon farmstead. The gateways Are deep obstacles of mud. The calves look up, through plastered forelocks, Without moving. Nowhere they can go Is less uncomfortable. The brimming world And the pouring sky are the only places For them to be. Fieldfares squeal over, sodden Toward the sodden wood. A raven, Cursing monotonously, goes over fast And vanishes in rain-mist. Magpies Shake themselves hopelessly, hop in the spatter. As art, the truth of this vision is intensely satisfying: He is a divided poet in a sense which his talent makes particularly interesting, and to which it gives a larger significance. The tradition of poets in English who have written about this kind of thing – Crabbe, Clare, Edmund Blunden – is one of a sober and perennial kind, not much concerned with or altered by changes in outlook and vision, spirit and Zeitgeist. But Hughes, like Lawrence, has the kind of creative temperament which is very much concerned with these things – indeed, sensitive to them, almost obsessed by them. He needs meaning, needs apocalypse, but down on the farm they are not to be found. No matter, the power and precision of his language produce them by the sole virtue of concentration, by laying the visible world inexorably before us.
