Daring Deeds of Dastardly Desperados, Part 1 Linnton as it appeared in Wikimedia Commons By Patrick Ahern and Theresa Thorud Linnton is a hardscrabble little town which has survived decades of grand expectations and dashed hopes, explosive growth and financial calamities. This story is about bizarre events in Linnton in the early twentieth century that influenced a major change in Oregon State law. This led to wildcat banking, land speculation, and the circulation of paper money issued by each individual bank. When New York banks suspended payments in gold in May of , another banks followed, causing banks to fail by the end of that year. This triggered a massive Depression. Affected by this crisis were two adventurous gentlemen, one from Missouri; the other from Iowa. They would meet May 22, as members of the largest wagon train over people and wagons to attempt the Oregon Trail. Burnett, a lawyer and prosecuting attorney from Liberty Missouri, was one of the Captains of the train. McCarver, a restless land developer, had platted Burlington, the first territorial capitol of Iowa. He saw great promise in the Oregon territory, leaving his family in Iowa to join "The Great Migration". He was named one of the council of nine men who were to have general charge of the Oregon wagon train. They knew of the rich land of the Tualatin valley and the thousands of bushels of wheat that could find their way onto ships at the docks in their bustling new town. They were encouraged by the location of a cattle trail there that led into the Tualatin Valley. Why, they only needed to improve it a little to make it wagon-friendly and the wheat would come flowing into warehouses soon to be built. McCarver wrote that their town, named after Senator Linn, would be one of the greatest cities in America, limited only by the scarcity of nails with which to build all of the buildings that he visualized. Alas, things were not to be so. The "Road to Linton", so named by surveyors in , was much harder to improve than expected. Myriad amounts of timber and brush had to be removed, leaving only a narrow, steep, and muddied trail that a loaded wagon could barely negotiate. Linnton had a chance though, until the "Canyon Road" was laid out in , making the trip to town and docks in Portland much easier than that to Linnton.. Nevertheless, the two entrepreneurs laid out the plat map of Linnton and sold the lots for a minor loss after paying their road and building expenses. They were both living elsewhere by Our two pioneers were to meet again in California, where they both had sought fortune in the gold fields. But McCarver still had his obsession with founding townsites, and made an agreement with John Sutter and his son to organize the plating and sale of lots on their land which would later become Sacramento, California. McCarver never forgave him. Both men were still destined to make their mark in West Coast history, however, McCarver as the founder of Tacoma Washington, and Burnett as the first governor of California.
