Kids, want to earn more? Go to college In the midst of debate over minimum wage hikes, tax cuts and income disparity comes another study that highlights a major determinant of earning power: The analysis of U. Census Bureau data found: The gap between the have-higher education and have-not is widening. The report states, "When the first wave of Baby Boomers were the same age that Millennials are today, the typical high school graduate earned 77 percent of what a college graduate made. Today, Millennials with only a high school diploma earn 62 percent. Consider the data compiled by the state: In DeSoto County in the school year, half of all high school graduates said they intended to pursue post-secondary education. Roughly half of those expected to enter two-year programs. In Charlotte County, 64 percent of Charlotte High School grads planned to go to college or technical school. Those numbers are sketchy, however. The schools and the state do not know whether graduates actually show up at a college on day one, nor how long they actually stay in school. The entry base is large and shrinks in higher levels. Which, of course, is a shame. But what can be done? We can try to find better ways to prepare and channel the next generation into post-secondary schools. We can make college more convenient and more affordable. But Riedinger said districts already begin college-career awareness programs in grade schools. Kids are required to take readiness courses in middle school. Students may not pay heed, of course. If so, though, they may someday find themselves simply hoping for an increase in the minimum wage. There is a movement out there to amend the Florida State Constitution to allow marijuana to be used for medicinal purposes across our state. Recently, I was lucky enough to observe a panel of people talk about the pros and cons of this new movement. There were three people who sat before us answering questions that were sent in ahead of time and then they took a few questions from the crowd. The panel consisted of the following people:
