

Chapter 1 : Greenteeth - Meaning And Origin Of The Name Greenteeth | blog.quintoapp.com

Granny Greenteeth, an imposing personage with flame-orange hair, a purple robe and, of course, green chompers, hears a "horrible, skin-prickling, hair-raising noise" coming from beneath her bed.

The weather is gorgeous here in Kentucky with a beautiful blue sky almost every day, and the temperature is in the 70s most days. I can remember reading it when I was a young girl. She eventually finds a clever use for them as well! Students are delighted by the sound effects that each object makes! Clifford wants to dress up for Halloween, so his friend Emily Elizabeth helps him with a costume. A great book to share with Kindergarten and 1st grade students. There are several different books about this little old lady and the crazy stuff she eats. I love the Halloween theme of this one. This book can be sung to the tune of "The 12 Days of Christmas". It has awesome illustrations, and the students love to sing along once they figure out how it goes. Will the pumpkin have a happy ending before Thanksgiving? This book has the possibility of good discussion points for older primary students. I read this out loud to a 1st grade class and they loved it! What seems to be a great idea at first glance turns into a big problem: I often recommend this book to my reluctant readers, and more often than not, they come back excited about what a good book it was! They are constantly checked out of my library. In order for the ghosts to leave the inn, Travis and Corey must figure out why they are there in the first place. I had a 4th grade teacher read one out loud last Halloween, and now the students are crazy about them! Jason Strange book series - Admittedly, I have not read these books yet, but I ordered the entire set for my library. What are your favorite books for Halloween? Share with us in the comments! Also, I have a Halloween giveaway coming very soon!

Granny Greenteeth And The Noise In The Night has 6 ratings and 1 review. Dolly said: This is a fun and rollicking cumulative story about a little old lad.

Books Fairs Are Market Research Think of the hours you volunteer at the book fair as market analysis time. You are there to see what kids and parents are buying, what teachers are looking for and may not be on the shelves and what booksellers are recommending. Ellen Monahan, a former book buyer for Bedford Falls Toys and Books in Charlotte, NC, finds that on the elementary level, kids often gravitate toward the books with a TV or movie tie-in. Blues Clues, Rugrats, Teletubbies and Animorphs were big a few years ago. Kids were also attracted to books that were packaged with toys and "gimmicks" such as yo-yos, beads, or lanyard. Board books are popular with the pre-school set. What parents look for. Parents who have more than one child to buy for also purchase trade paperbacks in order to make the most of their dollars. I buy a variety of chapter paperbacks including sports, mysteries, and activity books such as "How To Draw" books. She is a big advocate of historical fiction, and likes nonfiction about athletes and history. Monahan took pride in selecting the books that she offered to fifty schools in the Charlotte area. I review titles and look for quality books. There is no better way than a book fair, to expose children to current books," she says. By now you should be convinced that book fairs are good for market research. But is it a good place to sell your books? Not only will she speak to large groups of students, but also when time permits, she observes how teachers use the activities that she designed that correspond with her books. She has sold as few as 30 books at a fair, and as many as It has also provided a way for her to meet other authors and illustrators, has helped her stay in the public eye, and has led to other invitations to bookstores and schools. When I go out there and work with other people it opens me up in a new way. Writing is a way of sharing and communicating. Ken Compton, the author of several picture books including Granny Greenteeth and Noise in the Night, has been successful selling books at PTA meetings held in conjunction with book fairs. He has also spoken on the creative process that he and his wife his co-author go through when creating a book. Since this presentation is designed to encourage creativity in his listeners, Compton can customize it and use it for PTA groups or school visits in conjunction with book fairs. Bill Hooks is the author of many picture books, chapter books for middle-grade readers, and young adult novels. He suggests that when you are asked to go to a book fair, make sure that you go on the night when the parents are coming. He also provides a book list to be sent home with the children before a school appearance. But that personal contact, as many authors find, is invaluable in selling books and learning about your audience. Ready to Sign Up? You may have even overheard a teacher or parent say, "If only there were more books on Not a bad investment of three hours. Now about that sign-up sheet Types of Book Fairs There are two types of book fairs: Public book fairs are usually free or charge a small fee. They are generally sponsored by a large organization and are funded by local businesses. For example, in Charlotte, Novello is a week-long festival of reading that was created nine years ago to encourage adults and children to read. The local and national authors who are invited to attend speak at local schools and participate in a well-attended book signing. Within the realm of private book fairs there are two types: The independent book dealers choose a large variety of books to be sold and can fill individual requests by librarians and teachers. Book fairs run by Scholastic ship big displays of books to the schools without any emphasis on pre-ordering. But the selection process is done very carefully according to Suzanne Harrold, a member of the acquisitions committee for Scholastic. We are always looking for books that are new, innovative, and fresh. In nonfiction, Harrold said the Magic School Bus series filled a need for elementary school teachers. These books are user-friendly. For information on upcoming book fairs in your area, inquire at your local school or check out the American Booksellers Association web site: Carol Baldwin enjoys working with children of all ages. She loves to see them stretch their imaginations and creativity through her storytelling and creative writing workshops. She recently wrote her first book for middle grade students, Discover Glass.

Chapter 3 : How to Stop Grinding Teeth at Night: 14 Steps (with Pictures)

Get this from a library! Granny Greenteeth and the noise in the night. [Kenn Compton; Joanne Compton] -- When no one will help Granny find out what's making the noise under her bed, she starts a chain reaction that brings results.

October 26, The contemporary text about children on their way to "trick or treat" is accompanied by the work of 22 photographers who are donating all profits and royalties of the book to the Pediatric AIDS Foundation. A short profile of each award-winning photographer is included as an index. This is stuffed with games, jokes, costume ideas and bits of holiday lore such as, "According to Sicilian folklore, bats have the face of the devil and are thought to bring disease" and "If a black cat crosses in front of you, it brings bad luck. If it walks toward you, however, good luck comes with it. This is a unique story of the witch who saves the day by becoming a delivery person for Dingaling Pizza. Forty-eight, she picks one up on the first delivery. Even though Don Aurelio is warned "all is not as it seems," he stops at the house of three women - all of them witches - and falls in love with the youngest. Fate does not aid the passion, however, and Don Aurelio learns what happens when a human falls in love with an immortal being. This is a tremendous read-aloud for upper graders fourth through sixth and adds to the folklore of a holiday and a little-known culture. Spooks, werewolves, giants, demons, witches, vampires, dragons, skeletons and slithy toves are all here, and when you chant them over and over the full effect of this eerie book is found. The script splashes across the page sometimes with 6-inch letters, and "Bob" fills a whole two-page spread. Angus is transformed into a gray dog by a scarecrow, and only magic turns him about again. My "pick of the bunch" is a cumulative tale that really tickles the funny bone. A lean and gleaming toe That taps a tune in the dead of night By the light, by the light, By the silvery light of the Halloween moon! That gleaming toe hanging over the edge of a bridge is a real set-up for the Halloween creatures like a "bungling bouncy breezy bat, a ghastly drooling graveyard ghoul, a grumpy grungy hobgoblin sprite" and others to attack. That toe is mine! The clever collages by Giles Laroche make this a delightful combination. Now for older children. This may just be the winning trickor treat this year. This anthology selected by Martin H. Greenberg and Charles G. Waugh is for all ages, but the reading level makes it appropriate for sixth grade and above. The following is a list of novels for fifth grade and up that will guarantee a tingling of the spine: A book that ties Halloween to Christmas.

In an agreeably Halloweeny spinoff of "The Old Woman and Her Pig," Granny orders her cat to look under her bed to find out "what's making that horrible, skin-prickling, hair-raising noise that keeps me from my book"; but neither the cat nor Granny's weary broomstick nor the troll under her stairs, the goblin in her bathtub, or any of the other creatures lurking around her house is biddable.
