The Syd Hoff Papers contain book dummies, typescripts, galleys, illustrations, and color separations related to forty-six books published between and . They also include more than cartoons drawn for newspapers and magazines between and . He sold his first cartoon to The New Yorker at age eighteen, deciding then and there to give up serious painting for cartooning. Before his twenty-first birthday, Hoff was drawing the daily syndicated comic strip, "Tuffy," which appeared in more than newspapers worldwide for ten years. In he began what would become an almost twenty-year project, creating a daily one-panel cartoon, "Laugh It Off," which was syndicated by King Features in hundreds of newspapers. Hoff and his wife, Dora, had two daughters, Susan and Bonnie. His earliest attempts at publication were less than successful, but when one of his daughters was stricken with a physically debilitating condition, Hoff drew some pictures to help take her mind off her physical therapy. Hoff drew inspiration for most of his books and cartoons from the New York neighborhoods where he grew up. Simplicity is one of the most distinguishing features of his drawing style. Almost any literate American born between and would recognize a Hoff cartoon immediately, even if they could not name the illustrator. Between the "Tuffy" cartoon strip and the "Laugh It Off" single-panel cartoons, Hoff illustrations appeared in hundreds of newspapers and magazines worldwide between and . He himself also starred in a brief series of television shows in the s, "Tales of Hoff," in which he told a story and drew cartoons while on the air. In later years, Hoff made personal appearances at elementary schools to discuss his life and books, and to teach children that anyone can draw, no matter their artistic ability. He passed away at his home in Miami Beach, Florida on May 12, . Major Authors and Illustrators, pp. The papers are organized into three series: The material in the books series includes book dummies, typescripts, galleys, original illustrations, and color separations for forty-six books published between and . Hoff wrote and illustrated books mostly for early readers, publishing many titles in the Harper Books "I Can Read" series for children aged four to eight. Eleven "I Can Read" books are represented in the Syd Hoff Papers, including press sheets for a reprint of his most successful book, Danny and the Dinosaur. Many books in the series boast complete artwork, including both preliminary and final illustrations, and occasionally a book dummy with rough pen or pencil sketches. The non-fiction works represented in the Hoff Papers are joke books and several books teaching cartoon drawing to children. The papers in the book series are arranged alphabetically by title and the material for each title is arranged in order of creation when known. The papers in the cartoon series are organized into two subseries: King Features Syndicate and magazines. The King Features Syndicate material consists of more than single-panel ink cartoons created primarily for "Laugh It Off," a daily cartoon drawn for newspapers. The panels date from to , including those King Features drawings that predate the "Laugh It Off" debut in , but the bulk of the panels date from to . The cartoons cover a wide variety of subjects but most often deal with the relationship between the sexes. The cartoons are an outstanding reflection of popular culture, reinforcing the sexual stereotypes of their day. They are arranged chronologically in order of creation when known. The papers in the magazine subseries contain thirty-four large single and multi-panel ink and watercolor illustrations made for publication in several national magazines. The papers are arranged alphabetically by title of publication and the material for each title is arranged chronologically in order of creation when known. They are arranged chronologically.
