Just as important is effectively communicating the plan to your staff. So, where do you begin? The purpose of this blog is to highlight what goes into making your plan. For a smaller practice, your Privacy and Security Officer may be the same person. For larger practices, these duties will probably be split between two people. These are the folks who are going to be spearheading your Compliance Plan. Step 2 "Risk Assessment" This step requires you to review your workplace and electronic devices to assess the potential risks and vulnerabilities to the confidentiality, integrity, and availability of electronic Protected Health Information (ePHI) held by the Covered Entity or Business Associate. The first option is obviously the cheapest and the second can be costly, or you can use a combination of the two. The key is to be very detailed and identify where all your potential Privacy and Security issues may lie. This will include listing all computing and mobile devices, where paper files are stored, how you will secure your offices when you are closed, etc. This is not a one-time event and will change over time as technology and risks change. You will want to revisit your Risk Assessment anytime you have a Breach, theft, or major change in hardware or software, but at a minimum every year. Policies and Procedures need to be updated regularly and any changes need to be clearly documented and communicated to your staff. Step 4 "Business Associate Agreements" Most of you use vendors or contractors to help run your practice or business. This list can get pretty long, and should be documented in your Risk Assessment. Make sure you do an audit of your Business Associates before you accept a signed Agreement from them. Auditing means looking at their Compliance Plan. Employees are many times your weakest link. In addition, you must keep records that they have been trained. Come back next week when we will be talking about Privacy Officers. What does it take to be one? Who is a good candidate in your practice, and what kinds of responsibilities will they have? Jason is also an accomplished opera singer and has performed across the US and Europe.
