Beschreibung bei Amazon Lisa Unger, then a future writer of fantastic, captivating thrillers, was born in New Haven, Connecticut. At first, she headed to the Netherlands, where she succeeded even to learn Dutch a little bit. Although Lisa had to travel and adapt to the new environment quite much, which was definitely not easy for her, she discovered that she was fond of books and travelling. The frequent moves taught her how to be an attentive, patient observer. When she was a teenager, her family decided to come back to the United States and settle in Long Valley, a tiny town with a population of 1, people in New Jersey. Lisa spent her teenage years in this small town, and this "as well as a need to resettle frequently in her childhood" has influenced her formation as a personality and writer. In particular, her brother supposed that the creation of The Hollows, a town made up by Lisa Unger and introduced in a series of her novels, was inspired by her stay in Long Valley, though Lisa denied it. When Lisa turned eighteen, she headed to Manhattan, New York, where she enrolled at a college. The following thirteen years of her life were spent in New York, where she worked as a publicist at a big NY publishing house after her graduation. Even though Lisa Unger was more than successful at her work at the publishing house, she felt for a long time that something was going wrong in her life. She had a sensation that everything was not going the way it should in both her work and relationship. Then, the future author decided to finish her first novel, which she began to write 10 years ago. She worked over the novel every day, even if she had just a half hour or hour of time to dedicate to her work. Lisa felt a real happiness and gladness the day when she finally could place her work on the shelf. Yet, the sensation that the turning point of her life was approaching did not leave her. Once, when Lisa met her good friend, she also got acquainted with her future husband. For both of them, it was obvious that they love each from the very first moment of the acquaintance, and this radically changed the life of the newborn author. Since a move to Florida was a desired dream of her husband, Lisa immediately agreed to go. She quit a fairly enviable and highly-paid job and routed with him to Florida. There, she began to work over her second novel. Lisa had some savings and worked as a freelancer in public relations writing, and this helped her to get some free time for writing. Over time, her novels were published and she became a renowned bestselling author. She happily lives with her husband and daughter, and their common hobby is, indeed, travelling. Ridley Jones is a freelancer in her middle thirties, who can boast close ties with the family and a trendy career. She lives in the East Village of New York, and her life is almost irreproachable. Her life is moving on as usual, but one day she gets to save a kid from an approaching truck. Once, after all the city got to know Ridley Jones thanks to the media, a stranger contacts her and asserts that she is the daughter of his. With Jake, her new lover whom she seems to love incredibly much, she strives to go through this labyrinth of lies. She realized that she does not know where the truth is and where the lies is, who is her real friend or close person and who is the one who wants her dead. Even her boyfriend, whom she loves incredibly much, seems to have the things that he must keep in secret from her. Ridley starts to doubt every close to her person. This sequel of Ridley Jones series is not less thrilling and quavering than the previous book. After Ridley got to know the truth about her real father, she is confronted with another maze of creepy events. Once, she decided to look through the pictures she has taken during the last year and she found out a strange thing: And everyone, beginning with the government and ending with the underworld mafia, wants to know who that person is. In order to get to know finally who she in real is, Ridley decides to uncover the truth about that man for her. She supposes him to be her real father who has done a series of awful crimes against women. At the same time, she is being spied by the FBI agent. In search of real herself, she will uncover the terrible truth about herself. In general, this is a perfect two-book series, and you will definitely enjoy and be thrilled all the time while reading. She likes it that way, likes to keep her troubled past out of her new, seemingly normal life at a small college in upstate New York. Approaching graduation, with her trust fund about to run out, she takes a job babysitting for a deeply troubled young boy named Luke. Accustomed to controlling the people in his life, and a player of complex games, Luke may finally have met his match in Lana. Desperate to keep her dark past from intruding on her carefully constructed life, Lana is willing to do almost anything to keep the truth from coming out. Why do you think the author chose this poem to open the story? What connections do you see between the subject matter of the poem and that of the novel? Why does this debate have such significance for the characters in the novel? Why do you think this is so important to Lana? What are some other reasons Lana might be motivated to help others? Is this the difference between Lana and Luke? How did your perception of Lana change throughout the novel? Did you like her as a person? How did your trust in her account of things, her reliability as a narrator, shift as certain facts were revealed? I felt an unwanted tug of empathy p. How does this desire change throughout the course of the novel? Do you agree with her about this? The diary that is woven throughout the story of Lana spends much of its time meditating on the stresses that having a child puts on a relationship. Lana is immensely competitive with Luke, something he uses to his great advantage. Why do you think Lana is so easily sucked into competing with a young boy? Why is she compelled to keep participating in his games when she knows the dangers? Lana has a unique perspective on forgiveness. When something unspeakable happens, or when you do something unspeakable, it changes you. It takes you apart and reassembles you p. Are some things unforgivable? Is forgiveness something you do for yourself, or for the person being forgiven? On pages , Lana meditates on why people are so obsessed with violent, horrible crimes. We count on people not staring too long, or asking too many questions p. Are we are too polite, as a society? What do you think the right course of action is with these kinds of individuals? Using Luke as an example, what do you think was the right thing to do with him at the end of the book? Do you think Lana does the right thing in her actions towards Luke? Enhance Your Book Club 1. A Conversation with Lisa Unger This is your twelfth bookâ€”what unique challenges did In The Blood pose for such a prolific and accomplished author as yourself? One might think I had it all under control at this point. But every time I sit down to write a novel, it feels like the first time. So every book poses its own unique challenges. But Lana Granger was hiding a lot from me, even as she started telling me her story. And I had a hard time figuring her out, what she wanted, what her dark places were. I heard her voice very clearly, but it took me quite a while to get inside her. When I did, I was more surprised that I have been by any other character. What interests you so much about this kind of small town? Is it based on a real place? Do you have more novels planned for this setting? It just seemed like Anytown, USA, just the place where the story was set. My stories prior to this had always taken place in iconic locationsâ€”New York City, mainly. So The Hollows seemed kind of small time to me. But the story of Fragile, and the story that followed turned out to be intimately connected to the town where they took place. I realized that The Hollows was a place I needed to explore. It had an energy. Or maybe The Hollows is not done with me. Like many of your earlier novels, In The Blood takes a psychological perspective on crime. What is it that interests you about that take on violent behavior? I have an insatiable curiosity about human nature. The psyche is the ultimate mystery; there are so many elements at play in the development of each individual, and no two people will be affected in the same way by the same set of circumstances. My fascination for peopleâ€”what forms us, what drives us, what motivates usâ€”informs my fiction. Crime and violence act as a kind of crucible. When bad things happen, the truth of character is often revealed. There are no easy answers to questions like: Are we formed by nature or nurture? Why do some people kill, and lie, and steal? Why do others perform great acts of heroism? I spend a lot of time exploring answers to these questions in my fiction. What kind of research did you have to do for In The Blood? Do you enjoy the process of researching, or is it more of a means to an end? In The Blood was inspired by research, which is not always the case. I read an article in The New York Times Magazine about childhood psychopathy that really got me thinking about troubled children. That curiosity led me to a great deal more reading: But these books just built on research that I have been doing for more than a decade. Is Lana based on someone from your life? I think she was a natural manifestation of my curiosity about troubled childrenâ€”what forms them, how do their problems grow or change or disappear altogether as they grow older. Will a disturbed child necessarily evolve into a dangerous adult? Lana was a meditation on some of these questions. In The Blood is full of eerie, subtle foreshadowing, and hints of what is to comeâ€”how difficult is it to give the reader inklings of later events and revelations, without giving it all away? I write without an outline. I have no idea what my book is about, who is going to show up, what they are going to do day-to-day. I write for the same reason that I read, because I want to know what is going to happen. I am usually quite surprised, and hope my readers are, too. My smarter, cooler subconscious has a lot to do with that. Lana frequently reflects on the trauma of being involved in murder case that is sensationalized and obsessed over. Why do you think we are so compelled by these kinds of violent acts? Why do they make so much news? Do you think violent behavior is truly genetic, or is it brought out by environment? Or is it more complicated than that distinction? There are no easy answers. One might have the genetic code for violence, but environmental factors can either support its evolution into something ugly, or quash it all together. The reverse can also be trueâ€”early abuse, as well as physical and psychic trauma can impact an individual who might otherwise have been healthy. What can we look forward to next in your writing career? Are you currently working on a new novel? I am at work on a new novelâ€”always. My goal as a writer every day, is to be a better writer than I was yesterday. I think you can do that â€” dig deeper, work harder, delve more intimately into character, and hone your prose. I owe that to my readers. More Books From This Author.
