Index of Economic Freedom is an annual ranking of the economic freedom of countries from property rights to entrepreneurship published by The Heritage Foundation.

All Speeches Posted in Full. So our rights are under assault and the government is promoting dangers from which it should be protecting us. Private property rights are at the center of these issues. Beginning with the Berman "slum clearance" case in Washington, D. The abuses of eminent domain run the gamut, including: Immunity of individual officials and government often applies. The burden of proof usually falls on the property owner, unlike the burden of proof in criminal cases. The Willets Point group is now allied with other parties in a lawsuit where the lead plaintiff is State Senator Tony Avella and plaintiffs include the prestigious City Club of New York. They won a unanimous favorable ruling in State Appellate Court on July 2, The court held that converting parkland adjacent to the stadium to a shopping mall without permission from the state legislature would be in violation of the "Public Trust Doctrine. The case will be argued in DEC could have filed an appeal, but they would have had to go directly to the highest court of the state, the Court of Appeals, because first ruling in the case was at the local justice court. The Appellate Division would be skipped, to make the third level occur at the Court of Appeals. Norfolk pointed out, "We have used the freedom of information law to find discussions in with others before they planned litigation We are claiming the state is trying to reinstate by proxy to accomplish malicious enforcement on behalf of others, with the Adirondack Council and Adirondack Park Agency acting together. There is no power to review the May final determination. Not only are property rights threatened by big Wall Street money influencing the presidential campaign; property rights advocates face threats to stalwarts in the House Resources Committee [where many important policies on land issues are initiated]. Since Kelo, we do not see what real protection there is. Think of the German word Lebensraum, here meaning protection on a "landscape" level. The key to the significance of Magna Carta is the King being under the law, not part of the law. We tend to believe that in , the whole law sprung, but we owe a great deal to the British we left years ago for their system of government. In the third quarter of the twelfth century Henry II established circuit courts and a central appeals court. Over time, this became common to the realm of England. Only fifty years later in , nobles and clergy met at Runnymede to wrest from King John the rights we enjoy today in Magna Carta. In the early seventeenth century, travel abroad began. The same struggle unfolded in Virginia. In the Charter, the colonies enjoyed the same privileges as in England. William Penn, after his trial in England for preaching about his Quaker beliefs, looked to Magna Carta when drafting his blueprint for Pennsylvania. The Bill of Rights, Chapter 1, assured that the King could not interfere with the church. It is important to see the big differences: Magna Carta resulted from nobles against the King, whereas we were citizens against Parliament. We dissolved the political bond, by authority of the colony. We were born with these rights. American independence went back to the Magna Carta. We grounded political liberties on the consent of the governed. Pilon took questions, expounding on property rights, degrees of Takings and other ideas from the floor. The entire session is posted on the PRFA web site. Reed also established the Private Property Rights Caucus, the first of its kind. It has a continuing growing membership, and is unique in that it begins with the Northeast, rather than coming from the big ranching resource-industry states in the West. It serves as a forum for property rights issues, by sponsoring panels and publishing an e-newsletter. Clayton Dethlefsen is sought internationally as a trustworthy authority on wolves, and gathers information from sources in whatever countries where wolves exist. He is respected internationally as both a teaching expert and as a court expert in criminal and other cases, most recently in Finland. His speech ranged from issues countering incomplete information presented by government official to accomplish certain goals, to DNA analysis, to the meaning and significance of hybridization. He delved into behavior of wolves in the wild and why wolves raised in captivity behave passively in a classroom situation, such as in recent demonstrations for children and families in northern New York in locations that included libraries. He expertly listed characteristics of wolf behavior, and discussed the federal government extirpation of the smaller native wolves in the Northwest. He showed photos of how tenderly mother wolves nurture their young, preparing them for confidence in the wild, compared to the visibly scared demeanor of domestic wolf young. He explained factors, such as habituation, that lead to human attacks. He recounted the history of the federal policy of bringing in wolves to reduce the overpopulation of elk in Yellowstone. Wolves killed 13, to 16, elk in ten to twelve years, putting hunting outfitters out of business. The first part of the presentation was followed by an authoritative PowerPoint entirely devoted to diseases from wolves and to hybridization.

Through this award, the mentoring and exhibit promised to him is given to others The Florence Mill originated as the Winter Quarters gristmill, which was built under the supervision of Brigham Young. After the Mormons abandoned Winter Quarters in , the mill was rebuilt by a Gold-Rusher who never made it to California. Renovation of the formerly dilapidated building is still ongoing. No longer pink, the Florence Mill remains today because it evolved to fit the times and changing agricultural needs of farmers from the Civil War to the Cold War. The Florence Mill contains the only structural remains from Winter Quarters. Though remodeled, moved and added to, the Florence Mill contains some of the original hand-hewn beams and wooden pegs cut for the gristmill. The grain elevator, which was added in , continues to use the rope man-lift to reach the upper bins. During the time of the Mormon settlement in the area, they needed a mill to grind corn, wheat, and rye to create cornmeal and flour products. Brigham Young had the mill built to serve those needs. The original mill was constructed next to a creek that flowed into the Missouri River. When the Mormons moved on, usable parts were dismantled and moved on as well. The rest of the structure was eventually deserted. Later on, a new owner of the mill property tore the old structure down and some of the good timbers were used to build a new mill in the area. Surprisingly, that mill still stands, though it is no longer operational as a mill. The mill operated until the s. More on Mormon Era: Read more about the Florence Mill during the Mormon era.
