Amenities in the past were fairly simple—cafeteria and conference center, and maybe a fitness center or on-site childcare. Today, companies are giving more thought to extra offerings, from laundry services to bowling alleys. In addition to delighting employees, these atypical spaces are defining culture both from within and outside their building or campus. Mangia, Mangia Companies that occupy large and small sites go through an evaluation process of what that site can support for its employees, which is often influenced by basic philosophies about how the company sees itself within the context of community. One of the common amenities we see today is the provision of food. Are employees in an urban area with lots of local offerings, or are they in a suburb with fewer options nearby? The question is both economic and cultural. Outdoor dining and gatherings space. Rendering by IA Interior Architects. When a company opts to provide a full-service cafeteria, which is often free or highly subsidized, its strategy may be to keep employees local, even in dense urban environments, to avoid potentially losing a parking space, valuable time in the day, or disrupting the streak of genius that hits just when the office clears out for lunch. On the other hand, the company can opt to keep food offerings fairly light and encourage employees to rely on the surrounding community for food service, fueling the economic engine of the local city or town. Both strategies can be extremely effective: Hip to be Fit Fitness is another amenity that can be evaluated by what is available in the nearby community. Does the company encourage fitness as an amenity and convenience, or does it encourage use of nearby gyms through programs that discount membership? We work with many clients that provide on-site amenities for fitness to encourage both recruitment and retention, while others encourage staff to seek existing facilities within the communities where they work. The frequency with which we design prayer rooms, meditation rooms, and quiet zones is increasing. These spaces signal to existing and potential employees that a place to refresh or reset acknowledges and supports staff who seek ways to balance the variables of open work areas. Balancing energy and buzz with quiet and focus is coming to the forefront of planning and space design. Color is a crucial design component and adds valuable impact, but fully saturated spaces to pique awareness and engagement are no longer necessary in our perpetually media-rich, stimulated world.
