As sea levels rose, the river valley became flooded, and the chalk ridge line west of the Needles breached to form the island. At that time the sea level was much lower and carts of tin were brought across the Solent at low tide [10] [11] for export, possibly on the Ferriby Boats. Anthony Snodgrass [12] [13] suggests that a shortage of tin, as a part of the Bronze Age Collapse and trade disruptions in the Mediterranean around BC, forced metalworkers to seek an alternative to bronze. Trade however continued as evidenced by the remarkable local abundance of European Iron Age coins. From then onwards, there are indications that the island had wide trading links, with a port at Bouldnor , [22] [23] [24] evidence of Bronze Age tin trading, [11] and finds of Late Iron Age coins. The Romans built no towns or roads on the island, but the remains of at least seven Roman villas have been found, indicating the prosperity of local agriculture. In it was invaded by Caedwalla , who tried to replace the inhabitants with his own followers. In Arwald was defeated and the island became the last part of English lands to be converted to Christianity , [29] [30] [31] added to Wessex and then becoming part of England under King Alfred the Great , included within the shire of Hampshire. It suffered especially from Viking raids, [32] and was often used as a winter base by Viking raiders when they were unable to reach Normandy. Carisbrooke Priory and the fort of Carisbrooke Castle were then founded. Allegiance was sworn to FitzOsbern rather than the king; the Lordship was subsequently granted to the de Redvers family by Henry I, after his succession in For nearly years the island was a semi-independent feudal fiefdom, with the de Redvers family ruling from Carisbrooke. The final private owner was the Countess Isabella de Fortibus , who, on her deathbed in , was persuaded to sell it to Edward I. Thereafter the island was under control of the English Crown [36] and its Lordship a royal appointment. The island continued to be attacked from the continent: The French invasion on 21 July famous for the sinking of the Mary Rose on the 19th was repulsed by local militia. During , with a planned French invasion imminent , a large force of soldiers was stationed there. The French called off their invasion following the Battle of Quiberon Bay. When queen she made Osborne House her winter home, and so the island became a fashionable holiday resort, including for Alfred, Lord Tennyson , Julia Margaret Cameron , and Charles Dickens who wrote much of David Copperfield there , as well as the French painter Berthe Morisot and members of European royalty. During the Second World War the island was frequently bombed. With its proximity to German-occupied France, the island hosted observation stations and transmitters, as well as the RAF radar station at Ventnor. It was the starting-point for one of the earlier Operation Pluto pipelines to feed fuel to Europe after the Normandy landings. The show was notable both as one of the last public performances by Jimi Hendrix and for the number of attendees, reaching by some estimates , These are all variant forms of the same name, possibly Celtic in origin. It may mean "place of the division", because the island divides the two arms of the Solent. Its landscapes are diverse, leading to its oft-quoted description as "England in miniature". West Wight is predominantly rural, with dramatic coastlines dominated by the chalk downland ridge, running across the whole island and ending in the Needles stacks. The southwestern quarter is commonly referred to as the Back of the Wight , and has a unique character. The island has three principal rivers. Without human intervention the sea might well have split the island into three: The north coast is unusual in having four high tides each day, with a double high tide every twelve and a half hours. This arises because the western Solent is narrower than the eastern; the initial tide of water flowing from the west starts to ebb before the stronger flow around the south of the island returns through the eastern Solent to create a second high water. The geological structure is dominated by a large monocline which causes a marked change in age of strata from the northern younger Tertiary beds to the older Cretaceous beds of the south. This gives rise to a dip of almost 90 degrees in the chalk beds, seen best at the Needles. The northern half of the island is mainly composed of clays , with the southern half formed of the chalk of the central eastâ€”west downs, as well as Upper and Lower Greensands and Wealden strata. The chalky ridges of Wight and Purbeck were a single formation before they were breached by waters from the River Frome during the last ice age , forming the Solent and turning Wight into an island. All the rocks found on the island are sedimentary , such as limestones , mudstones and sandstones. They are rich in fossils; many can be seen exposed on beaches as the cliffs erode. Lignitic coal is present in small quantities within seams, and can be seen on the cliffs and shore at Whitecliff Bay. The island is one of the most important areas in Europe for dinosaur fossils. The eroding cliffs often reveal previously hidden remains, particularly along the Back of the Wight. As a result, the island has been nicknamed "Dinosaur Island" and Dinosaur Isle was established in The area was affected by sea level changes during the repeated Quaternary glaciations. The island probably became separated from the mainland about , years ago, during the Ipswichian interglacial.
