In the late s Russia and several Asian countries suffered a series of interlinked crises that stemmed from high fiscal deficits, large current-account deficits, and dollar-denominated debt. In Mexico got into trouble after it built up unsustainable dollar debts, and during the s several Latin American countries were forced to default when rising US interest rates made it impossible to pay back their loans. No wonder, then, that when US interest rates rise and the dollar strengthens, investors are quick to ditch emerging-market assets. They are particularly wary about developing countries that combine high current-account and fiscal deficits " funded by dollar-denominated debt " with a dearth of defence mechanisms, such as a big pile of foreign-exchange reserves. But the rush for the exit has created interesting buying opportunities. Investors have tarred all the emerging markets with the same brush, yet their individual situations differ widely. In a moment of panic, all emerging markets move the same way, but over time capital will return to the solid, well-managed, growing economies. This outward-looking trade bloc comprising Mexico, Colombia, Peru and Chile will reward long-term investors over the next few years. Founded in , the goal is to give member-country businesses access to a greater pool of resources, capital, customers and workers to build the scale they need to trade successfully with Asia. Over the coming years closer integration between Alliance members will help drive growth. Since a succession of infrastructure projects, visa agreements and tariff reductions have boosted the movement of people and goods within the bloc. The creation of a shared stockmarket and standardised financial-sector regulation should increase inter-Alliance capital flows. Beginning in , Peru, Chile and Colombia saw the prices for their major exports fall. The plunging commodity prices were too much for Venezuela. But, in a testament to their macroeconomic strengths, the Pacific Alliance countries avoided recession. During the good times their governments had paid down debt, which meant they could comfortably run larger fiscal deficits to sustain growth during the commodity downturn. Unlike most of the developed world, the Pacific Alliance countries raised interest rates back to normal levels soon after the global crisis of That meant they had room to cut rates when commodity prices tanked a few years later. That boosted the competitiveness of non-commodity exports and made imports more expensive " thereby acting as an automatic control on current-account deficits. These can be used to repay foreign debts and prop up the local currency, precluding a rout. In Peru, where dollarised debt was relatively high, the central bank managed to control the depreciation, slowly bringing down the value of the currency and giving banks time to adjust to the new reality. One key point is that none of the Pacific Alliance countries have dangerously high combinations of fiscal and current-account deficits. Compare that with 8. History[ edit ] PATH headquarters in Seattle Founded in with a focus on family planning , PATH soon broadened its purpose to work on a wide array of emerging and persistent global health issues in the areas of health technologies, maternal health , child health, reproductive health , vaccines and immunization , and emerging and epidemic diseases such as HIV , malaria , and tuberculosis. PATH is one of the largest nonprofit organizations in global health today. It targets health problems, evaluates possible solutions, and assesses whether they would be useful in finding health solutions. The sticker helps health workers know when a vaccine has reached its preset temperature limit and can no longer be safely used. It promotes more reliable vaccinations as well as cost savings, because health workers no longer have to throw out vaccine just because they suspect it has gone bad. The single-dose, autodisable injection system consists of a needle attached to a small bubble of plastic that is prefilled with medication. The system is designed to prevent disease transmission and enable health workers with only a little training to administer vaccine and other drugs in remote villages. Ultra Rice has been produced and tested in several countries, including Brazil, Burundi, and India, where it has been served in school-lunch programs. In Brazil, PATH has partnered with a commercial rice producer to sell Ultra Rice on supermarket shelves and reach 10 million low-income consumers in three years. The careHPV test, developed in conjunction with Qiagen as the first molecular diagnostic to screen for human papillomavirus HPV “the most common cause of cervical cancer” in clinics in low-resource settings. The condom has received regulatory approvals in China and the European Union and became commercially available in China in late The vaccine was developed by Serum Institute of India and introduced in Burkina Faso, Mali, and Niger in December to prevent the spread of a strain of meningitis found only in Africa. Within six months, the vaccine eliminated new cases of meningitis A in the areas where it was introduced. In , PATH helped Nicaragua become the first developing country to introduce rotavirus vaccines within months of their introduction. Interim results of the study released in showed the vaccine provided about 50 percent protection against malaria for young children ages 5 to 17 months. Interim study results released in showed RTS,S reduced cases of malaria among infants by 33 percent. In Kenya, where PATH has worked for more than 20 years, the organization conducts research into "multipurpose prevention technologies" that can protect women from HIV and pregnancy [40] and provides support groups and health services for married adolescents and other groups at high risk for HIV. Named because of its natural pulling power, this interactive street theater draws people in rural communities to clearings, dirt roads, and village centers“any open space where people can gather. PATH worked with local governments and community groups to encourage community leaders, health workers, pregnant women, and families to deliver babies in health centers, rather than at home, and adopt other best practices to protect mothers and their infants during pregnancy, childbirth, and infancy. The project used community outreach approaches including door-to-door clinical surveillance , distribution of printed health materials, and street theater to spread messages about maternal and newborn health. PATH currently works in more than 70 countries. Alejandro Zaffaroni Health Award for its work on the Uniject device, a sterile pre-filled, single-use syringe.
