A year later he also had the Stanton Theatre located at North Howard Street demolished in July also replaced by a parking lot to avoid any competition with his new theatre which bore his name. Mechanic bought the theatre from The Stanley-Warner Co in February and changed the name to The Stanton in the fall of , using it primarily for legitimate shows, closed circuit TV shows, variety shows, and movies and also including live performance shows which he leased to JF Theatres. He engaged architect John M. Mechanic died in from a heart attack while the building was under construction and his widow, Clarisse, Mayor Theodore McKeldin and Eugene M. Feinblatt, chairman of the Baltimore Urban Renewal and Housing Agency, presided over the opening gala January 16, Clear Channel Entertainment operated the Hippodrome and chose not to renew its lease on the Mechanic. After hearings in August , [7] the Baltimore Commission for Historical and Architecture Preservation declined to grant the building landmark status. Brown Enterprises unveiled a plan to add a story tower that would house a room hotel and rental units. The former theater space would be converted to retail and a skylight installed to make it more welcoming to shoppers. The plan did not contain cost estimates or details. While initially delayed due to historical preservation concerns, officials granted his request in March In September , the parking garage closed and crews erected fences to begin demolition work, followed by construction of new high rise residential and commercial space. The fan-shaped auditorium that seated 1, sat atop the podium and had a street-level entrance on Hopkins Plaza as well as a pedestrian bridge that connected to an elevated walkway leading to other buildings in Charles Center. Balconies were behind the orchestra seats and protruded beyond the exterior walls to give the building the appearance of a ratchet gear when viewed from above. The exterior of the building was rough concrete that bore the markings from the wooden forms used to create the walls. The street entrance on Hopkins Plaza led to a stairway that took patrons to the lobby on the second floor. The exterior lobby wall was glass while interior walls had a faux wood finish or were covered with burnt-orange vinyl. The plaza-level entrance was framed by towers holding stairs and elevators to access the balcony. The stage house was clearly defined as a separate element attached to the auditorium.
