Someone to pick up the reins and ride alongside the likes of Maggie Osborne, Leslie LaFoy and all those other wonderful authors who have given us so many frontier romance keepers in the past. Stacey Kayne has penned a treasure Each character carries his or her own weight, adding depth and humor to this honestly written story. Breathtaking western journey that is wild and vivid. Filled with danger, hope, redemption along with passionate characters. Believable story comes alive in the very beginning and ends beautifully. Stacey Kayne knows how to write a great and thrilling western historical read. I give this a bouquet of roses. These Daines kids were a menace to society, and obviously hell bent on busting his head open! He waited a moment then carefully peeked into the cabin. The strong scent of soap hung in the air as Tuck scanned the perimeter for danger of flying kitchenware. Seeing that all was clear, he stepped inside. Some fresh biscuits or maybe a couple flapjacks could certainly help to ease his headache. He picked up a rag from the table and dropped it on a puddle of water beside the small water-filled washtub. This woman is trouble. The sooner he unloaded her, the better. He turned his attention back toward the stove. You can contact a family member from there. The woman was half naked! Standing there in nothing but one of his blue button-up shirts. Dear God--she had legs for a mile. His eyes slowly worked back up those long, ivory limbs, then stopped on the hard piece of metal aimed at his chest. Where the hell did she get a revolver? Her thumb slipped over the hammer and pulled it back. Her steady hand and hard gaze told him she might know how to use the blasted thing. Now, I suggest you wait outside until my clothes have dried. We can discuss our business arrangement then. But then, he had been gaping at her. What the hell did she expect with what she had on? Skylar drew a deep, calming breath as she felt the tables beginning to tip in her favor. Her weak-minded mistake suddenly began to glow with appeal. But she knew leverage when she was married to it. The only reason your father had that deed is because he asked for it. He gave my brother some cockamamy story about needing proof that we intended to buy his horses and Chance trusted him enough to hold onto our deed. He had to be lying. Her father had plainly stated he and Chance were partners. What kind of a fool did he take her for? Garret is my responsibility. I look out for him, which means no green-eyed, gambling drunk is going to swindle us out of a partnership. The edition published by arrangement with Harlequin Books S. Each character carries his or her own weight, adding depth and humor to this honestly written story. Hearing the killer is after his ranch, Tucker teams up with a woman who has no trouble taking control of his mustangs--or his desire. Thanks for inviting me over. Mustang Wild is set in the American West of How did you become interested in this time period? An American History college course was a major catalyst in my writing aspirations, and essentially chose my genre for me. Heading back to college, I had just bought my first computer. While sitting in my history class, my visual brain steeped in facts and images of the American West, my mind began its usual wandering. With a computer at my disposal, I decided to try and type out my daydreams. Halfway through my history course, my first historical western romance novel was born. What do you like least about this period? Anything that constrained you or that you had to plot carefully around? The Wild, Wild, West! My mind is constantly searching for ways to submerge my characters in the beauty and grandeur of the American West. While writing my first western, Bride of Shadow Canyon, I discovered that an adventurous setting with ever-changing untamed scenery was a driving force of my imagination. One challenge has been to find accurate maps of the terrain during my time period, figuring distance, settlements, and the amount of time required for travel. Many give detailed accounts of days on the trail between military forts and the perils faced in between. What do you like to read? I love to read rich historical westerns, of course. I have a keeper shelf full of Garwood, Lowell, Spencer, Miller! I also enjoy contemporary romance with some edge to it! I like heroes with a sense of old-fashioned justice J. Care to share a bit about your writing process? Are you a pantsner or a plotter? Do you write multiple drafts or clean up as you go? For me, it starts with daydreaming. A book usually emerges in my mind as a funny or high-tension scene! no telling where that scene will end up in the book, because I do absolutely nothing in a linear fashion. At this point, I start to mold and merge, bridging the chapters together and brushing in the scenery. I clean as I go by the time I write the last word in the last scene no telling what chapter that will be , the book is finished. What sparked this book? Was it a character? Mustang Wild started with the hero. Tucker Morgan appeared in my mind lounged at a card table, good luck raining down on him in spades, and as the heroine observes, wearing a smile that can sweet-talk the spines off a prickly cactus. As charming as he is, I really wanted him to get knocked out with a skillet. Being a fly-by-the-seat-of-his-pants kind of guy, Tucker needed a woman who could whip him into shape, and his mustangs too. Skylar took over from there. Did you have to do any major research for this book? I love to plot a journey, study the different settings and landscapes and paint them into the book. I have this crazy fetish for almanacs, geographical charts and landscape picture books. For Mustang Wild and Bride of Shadow Canyon I created storyboards with clips of scenery, a clockwise evolution of the story through scenery changes. This way, no matter what area of the story I was writing in, I could glance up at the storyboard and have an instant visual for the terrain. Very useful! looks pretty on the wall too! Writing a lady mustanger was a challenge! I wanted a realistic portrayal of my heroine breaking horses. I visited a few horse ranches in my area, spoke with trainers, watched quite a few horse training videos, and read a mountain of books. How did that experience contribute to your selling Mustang Wild? If anything, The Golden Heart taught me perseverance. The very day I finished my first manuscript, Bride of Shadow Canyon, I mailed it off to the Golden Heart! and to my sheer astonishment, it finaled. Two years went by before I finaled again with my fourth manuscript, Mustang Wild. But throughout those five years I learned to set goals, to give myself deadlines, to suck up disappointment, and above all, to keep writing. Are these related, or are you working on two series? Mustang Wild is available now. Bride of Shadow Canyon will be out in April. Bride of Vengeance will likely be out in early Updates for official titles and release dates will be posted to my website:
