After reading nonfiction passages about science, geography, or history topics, students answer multiple-choice and short-answer questions to build seven essential comprehension skills.*

Teaching Students to Ask Questions Step 1: Divide the class into small groups to discuss what they know about the subject. If students have no prior knowledge, set aside time to have students browse through books and magazines, review their textbooks, watch a film, or participate in a similar experience that will provide some background information. In their groups, have students pose questions that they want to answer. Have them share these with the entire class and write them on chart paper. Have students read the nonfiction text assignment. Assign the questions from Step 2 to the different groups and have them discuss them. Select questions for the class to discuss together. Make sure students include specific details to support their answers and have them share high points from the group discussions. Model good questioning skills by prompting students with these open-ended questions when your class is reading science and social studies texts: Does the author try to persuade you in any way? Can you identify the facts? What new information did you learn? How did this new information change your way of thinking about this subject? What words, phrases, or statements does the author use that caught your attention? How did they make you feel? What did they make you think? Did the author weave opinion and fact statements into the piece? Find examples of each. Were there any photographs, illustrations, charts, graphs, or diagrams that were important? Select two or three and show what you learned from them and explain why you believe each one was important. Did the reading leave you with unanswered questions? How did you connect to the piece? Was it an issue that affects your community and the world? When evaluating students, set standards for supporting ideas and ask students to include specific details to back up points.
