

Chapter 1 : blog.quintoapp.com - Volunteers and Partners Toolbox

Partners in the Wilderness, the captivating debut novel by Ed Kienzle, tells the tale of Travis Driskoll and his father as they head into the wilderness of Wyoming for the adventure of a lifetime. But what begins as a fun-filled hunting trip becomes a life-altering experience for a young boy when his father is brutally attacked by a bear.

Howard would begin drafting the federal Wilderness Act of 66 drafts in all from a cabin he acquired in the Adirondacks. Howard kept a journal of his first trip to the Adirondack Park. For 72 years the extended Zahniser family, now including the fourth generation, has returned to the same place in the Adirondacks. This August I held a cook-out to welcome them back. They drove to Schenectady via State Route 7 no Interstate 88 then. In Schenectady, they met up with Paul Schaefer and his wife Carolyn and their children. Paul was well on route to becoming one of the most accomplished Adirondack wilderness conservation leaders of the 20th century, as well as home-builder, hunter, angler, Adirondack author and filmmaker. The two families drove to the Adirondacks via Northville no I , Wells, and then east on Route 8 to Bakers Mills where they arrived for several weeks at the Schaefer family cottage at the foot of Eleventh Mountain. From that home base 72 years ago, Howard Zahniser and Paul Schaefer and their families began a lifelong friendship and partnership for wilderness, here and across the country. From their base camp, they explored what is now the Siamese Ponds Wilderness and then what is now the High Peaks Wilderness. They frequently collaborated about all of this, for the next 18 years. Together, with allies, they achieved much for the Adirondacks and for the country. Their children learned to fish, climb apple trees, swim and observe wildlife. Some played mountain music, some sang. They came to know local people. They all gained strength, endurance and confidence. Ed is a frequent contributor to the Almanack. We collaborate with him every chance we get. Paul, having come with his parents and siblings to the Adirondacks in or so, got to know local Adirondackers. They were generous and helped to support the Schaefer family who were from the city and, in , did not yet know how to live and survive a rural life. Paul and Carolyn, in turn, taught many other city people to feel comfortable in and to love and embrace the Adirondack experience, its residents, and its wild spaces. One, Evelyn, with husband Don, has lived and worked in the Park for many years. I am one of those visitors that Paul helped make welcome in the Adirondacks. A great view of Crane Mt. As we came back we heard a breakfast bell and smelled bacon. We also sat a while on the porch swing, the half moon just down the back of Eleventh Mt. We thought we saw northern lights. It was hot, 80 degrees in the shade. Yet, because we all were at feet we were somewhat cooler than those in the valley below and even cooler than those baking in Schenectady. Later, some of us sat on the cabin porch talking. Briefly, we were transported to another time. It was like the hermit was performing right there and then. I should journal about it. Howard, were you listening?

Chapter 2 : Partners in the Wilderness | Royal Ontario Museum

Partners in the Wilderness, the captivating debut novel by Ed Kienzle, tells the tale of Travis Driskoll and his father as they head into the wilderness of Wyoming for the adventure of a lifetime. But what begins as a fun-filled hunting trip becomes a life-altering experience for a young boy when.

They get along, so to speak, because the elk needs grooming and the magpie is looking for dinner. Some have quit migrating, opting to hang around towns with humans who protect them from predators like wolves. As a doctoral student at the University of Alberta, Robert Found, now a wildlife biologist for Parks Canada, discovered over years of observing their personalities that bold elk stayed, while shy elk migrated. But he noticed something else in the process of completing his research: As elk laid down to rest at the end of the day, magpies approached. There appeared to be a pattern: Found created a bold-shy scale for elk, measuring how close they allowed him to get, where elk positioned themselves within the group, which elk fought other elk, which ones won, how long elk spent monitoring for predators and their willingness to approach unfamiliar objects like old tires, skis and a bike. He also noted which elk accepted magpies. To study the magpies, he attracted the birds to 20 experimental sites with peanuts on tree stumps. He also noted who landed on a faux-elk that offered dog food rather than ticks a previous study showed magpies liked dog food as much as ticks. Bolder elk and magpies exhibited riskier behaviors like tolerating the experimenter, approaching novel objects and fending off animals. About half of the elk let magpies land, and just over half the magpies landed on the fake elk. And it was the shy elk and bold magpies that were more likely to engage. This was counterintuitive for an elk: But magpies also eat winter ticks. They clump together and infest by the thousands, remaining on a host all winter, expanding to grape size when fully engorged. But hair loss around the neck is still a problem. Two decades ago, Bill Samuel, a retired moose biologist and author of a definitive book on moose and winter ticks, found some moose also evade the pests by tolerating magpies. Found thinks, shy elk gain an advantage over bold elk and compensate for their bashfulness by accepting magpies. Few studies have examined the role that personality plays in shaping interactions between species, especially mutualistic interactions. In one study, however, aggressive spiders in so-called mutualistic relationships suffered compared to docile spiders. And in another study, bold cleaner fish tended to cheat mutualism by consuming the protective mucus around their client fish and swimming off instead of eating parasites. Found thinks personality reveals a messier mutualism than once assumed. This could be a three-way relationship: Does tick personality factor in? And does this behavior extend to all elk and magpies, or is it just some western Canadian quirk? While more research remains to be completed, Dr. Whether emotional concepts or just behavioral tendencies, personalities exist in all kinds of species and can influence the interactions among and between them. In this case, opposites attract “ and it seems to be working.

Chapter 3 : Alaska Wilderness Lodges | Best Remote Lodges (Fly-In or Boat-In)

Partners in the Wilderness, the captivating debut novel by Ed Kienzle, tells the tale of Travis Driskoll and his father as they head into the wilderness of Wyoming for the adventure of a lifetime.

Chapter 4 : Wilderness Air » Partners

> Partners in the Wilderness Partners in the Wilderness Using a selection of ROM objects and reproductions, the relationship between early European settlers and Native Peoples is also explored.

Chapter 5 : A Partnership For Wilderness, - - The Adirondack Almanack

Partners in the wilderness Joanna Klein, NYTspect, Dec 12 , IST Scientists are wondering if shy elk compensate for their bashfulness by accepting grooming magpies.

Chapter 6 : Partners in the Wilderness: Travis's Choice by Ed Kienzle

Children in the Wilderness. Children in the Wilderness is a non-profit organisation supported by ecotourism company Wilderness Safaris to facilitate sustainable conservation through leadership development and education of rural children in Africa.

Chapter 7 : Partners in the Wilderness by Ed Kienzle - FictionDB

Partner with Us At Wilderness, we look for opportunities to partner with companies who share our values and our commitment to protecting wild places and inspiring Americans to care for them. Since , The Wilderness Society has led the effort to permanently protect more than million acres of American wilderness.

Chapter 8 : Trout fishing wilderness lodge in the Algoma region of northern Ontario.

Wilderness Inquiry Partner Organizations. WI partners with organizations all over the country and the world. Here is an alphabetical list of current partner organizations.

Chapter 9 : Prayer in the Wilderness “ A place where prayers are answered.

Chances are that's a shy elk looking back at a bold magpie, in the photograph above. They get along, so to speak, because the elk needs grooming and the magpie is looking for dinner.