This brand-new title is a shorter version of the all-new Barron's blog.quintoapp.com prospective law students must pass the LSAT as a prerequisite to admission at ABA-approved law schools.

I particularly find Mr. Blair offered powerful insights into why some people struggle miserably with the LSAT. Law schools want the bragging rights to the highest LSATs they can get. The LSAT is your enemy. You must defeat it decisively in order to move forward into a law school that the marketplace of employers will respect. But how to do this? Consider the lessons offered by Mr. Blair, as they relate to the LSAT. As if LSAT results were a lottery. Do not, do not go down this path. They comfort themselves that they are preparing effectively for their future, but they never engage the enemy. If this is you, test your current level of readiness, now, by taking a complete practice test. I mean by this an old official LSAT, under true timed conditions, and then score it. What should your target score be? Feel free to contact me with your result and your thinking about your goal. I can prepare for the LSAT in that amount of time, right? The score results from old LSATs—taken under true timed conditions—will reveal your readiness. It can be mastered. But you may need a considerable amount of time. That can be a formula for failure. Listen to your practice LSAT results. What I did was really simple! I took a test under simulated conditions on Monday. On Wednesday, I took a break. Thursdays through Saturdays I repeated my Monday through Wednesday schedule. On Sunday, I restudied the difficult questions in the two sets I took in that week. The entire process took me 17 weeks. I took two weeks off to deal with school exams. In total it took me 19 weeks. I took 34 practice tests! I believe I spent an average of six hours on each test, including two review sessions. That adds up to around hours in total. My actual test score was My improvement from the low s to the low s was quick, about seven to eight tests. But it took me tests to go from to Once I broke , I stayed in the low to mid s for the remaining seven to nine tests. It seems to me that about three weeks and six to eight tests are needed to consolidate a level. I graduated from a college in northeast and am going to law school in the same region next semester. What basis in life experience do you have to make such a decision? Are you being pushed to go by someone else, like your parents? Are you secretly trying to torpedo your chances by failing on the LSAT? If so, you need to have a frank conversation with those around you. Get your life on a solid course. Make ambitious, achievable goals that are in line with your heartfelt desires. LSAT preparation and law school will be absolute misery for anyone not truly desiring to become a lawyer. If so, stop immediately and test it, by taking a timed practice test on an old official LSAT. How did you do? What do you need to earn? Conflicting Values This relates to item 4 above. Who is driving you to law school? Is law school your main vocational objective now? But if you want to win admission offers from respected law schools, you are going to have to restructure your life in order to defeat the LSAT. Work towards that steadily as part of your schedule, six days each week. If you can, great. Then move to the next one. But remember, no tutor or class can substitute for you proving to yourself, over and over through timed practice tests, scored by you, that you are truly ready for the LSAT. Stare your opponent straight in the face. Attack it regularly, in practice test after practice test. Learn from every mistake you make. Track your practice test score results. If you practice diligently, extracting the maximum possible learning from each practice test, you will climb the LSAT learning curve.
