Should we head in to the dining room? Jenna lingered, watching Ty skate off the ice. I was just enjoying the game. You being such a big sports fan and all. Tara cast her a hint of a knowing smile, while Liz downright grinned all through dinner. With Ty, who had a day off. She really wished he and his friends would find another bar to hang out in. It appeared Victor had coupled up with Lisa, the platinum blonde bar bunny who was also a regular, and Eddie had finally come up with the courage to ask Renee out, so now the two of them were dating. And since Ty, Victor, and Eddie were pretty much best friends, it made sense for Ty to hang out with his buddies. Which was why it could never happen again. Seeing him again reminded her of just how good it had been, which made her want it to happen again, which just made everything worse, and made her bitchy and cranky. She hoped Liz was great at choosing men. This had to work. But Dylan, the guy Liz brought with her, was worth the wait. He was a suit, but hot as hell in a suit. Light brown hair, gorgeous blue eyes, and the kind of smile that lit up a room. Very tall and well built, and every woman stopped and stared when he walked in. He had an easygoing presence about him that commanded attention. He looked rugged and full of masculinity, but he was friendly. He hung out at the bar with her and Liz, but he was focused on her. She took a break, putting Renee behind the bar since traffic was light. Dylan drank whiskey and soda. She liked that about him. He was a lawyer. He should be running with some model or someone in the corporate world, not a girl with tattoos, piercings, and purple streaks in her hair. She wondered what he saw in her. I like the outdoors. Hiking, camping, water skiing, riding my bike. Fortunately, I have some clients in Colorado, so I do some snowboarding and skiing. Can I get an intro? He shook his hand. She had to get back behind the bar anyway. Renee took off to see to her customers at the tables, and Liz pinned her with a suspicious look. I get plenty of it here, as you can see. Even though Dylan was drop dead gorgeous, in the middle of a pack of handsome men, it was Ty who captured her attention. He tilted the bottle of beer to his lips, and all she could think of was his mouth on hers, the way he kissed her. She watched his fingertips absently stroke the moisture on the outside of the bottle as he laughed with the guys, and remembered his touch, the way his fingers played along her skin. Maybe you just notice him when he is here. No one says you have to marry the guy, but if you had fun with him, who cares if he plays sports? Maybe she should just screw his brains out and get him out of her system, and then they could go their separate ways. Remember, I dumped him. He still smiled and waved at her, he was still friendly. When had she become that woman? Go up and talk to him. I have some legal matters to talk over with him anyway. And if Dylan had the hots for you, no hockey team in the world would have been able to pull him away.
