But our education system needs to change – perhaps radically – if it is to prepare our children to thrive in the twenty-first century. This means looking further afield for ideas, whether in the high-tech halls of Silicon Valley, the exam factories of South Korea, or the inclusive classrooms of Finland. Around the world, countries are grappling with how to scale quality education for their youth. While the spread of schooling over the past century is one of the great global success stories, expansion has too often involved insufficient mastery of core content and thinking skills: Alex Beard spends much of his time searching the world for the most promising educational practices and sharing his discoveries with teachers, school leaders and policymakers in forty-six countries. Peter Hyman is co-Director of Big Education – a group of schools and programmes designed to change how education is done in the UK. Bethany Koby has created the award-winning make-it-yourself kits that empower children to create with – rather than be fearful of, or passive towards – technology. Join us for a discussion between pioneers who are rethinking the components of the teaching and learning process – from curriculum to materials to teacher development – and who are looking in surprising places for their inspiration. In association with City of London School. Speakers Alex Beard Alex Beard has worked in education for a decade. After starting out as an English teacher in an inner-city comprehensive, he completed his MA at the Institute of Education before joining Teach For All, a growing network of independent organizations working to ensure that all children fulfill their potential. He is the author of Natural Born Learners, which takes readers on a dazzling world tour of the future of learning. Alex Beard has worked in education for a decade. He is the co-founder and the first headteacher of School 21, a pioneering 4 to 18 school that opened in Stratford, East London in The school has a growing reputation for developing oracy speaking skills having set up Voice 21, a charity working with more than schools across the country. It has also developed sophisticated programmes for real world learning, and wellbeing. Much of his current research builds on the Hole in the Wall HIW experiment, instigated in while Mitra was chief scientist at NIIT, in which children were given free access to a computer embedded in a wall between his office and an Indian slum at Kalkaji, Delhi. It inspired a debut novel by Vikas Swarup which went on to become the Oscar winning movie Slumdog Millionaire.
