

Chapter 1 : Straight From The Heart - Poem by Rene Stobaugh

Straight from the Heart If you enjoy peace and quiet, writing and poetry, digital art, and speaking from the heart, then welcome to my blog ~ Sandi Category Archives: Poetry.

September 19, I smelled it as soon as I walked through the front door. That worse than the worse ever smell that fumigates your car nearly chokes you to death and lingers for miles and miles down the road. I knew there was a skunk in the house. Like a bloodhound, I searched for the culprit. And there, sitting on the couch giggling like two mischievous imps were my brothers playing with, not one but three, bushy-tailed baby skunks. I like wild animals; even wanted a raccoon once. But never a skunk! But they were so cute. So, after much whining and pleading my parents said we could keep them for a little while in a box outside. Oh, the plans that we made for our baby critters. The talk of the town. The kids with the baby skunks. The next day, however, the charm of owning a skunk soon wore off. So I decided to give mine to my best friend, Florence who was older and more experienced at caring for animals. After all, she took in every stray dog in the neighborhood. And besides, it was her birthday. And her mother was even less thrilled. Morgenstern served four years in the Waves, had tattoos on both of her muscular arms, and was as intimidating as a Grizzly Bear. Not even the Godfather would have had the guts to question her authority. Then he bit me again. I jerked my hand away and landing safely on all fours he raised his bushy tail and fired! A normal kid would have left it there. No, I flew home! Confused and nearly blinded by the ghastly fumes, I staggered into the kitchen where my dad sat eating a bowl of cereal. He was a Clint Eastwood kinda guy; fearless, quiet and reserved. Even now, standing before him, feeling like an idiot smelling worse than a cesspool with a baby skunk dangling from my hand, he never flinched. Barely batted an eye. Motionless as a corpse. But like a tick on a dog, the stink had latched on and was there to stay for who knows how long. Everyone kept their distance but was nice enough not to tell me I stunk like a skunk. I was back in Mrs. My brothers and I set the skunks free.
