Practical Etiquette Creating an Oasis of Respect When I first came upon this site, Practical Etiquette, I found its title to be a bit of an oxymoron. I envisioned the set of rules that comprised "etiquette" to be quite rigid, if not overbearing.

Helping out Grocery Stores Money exchange: Ask what the exchange rate is, pay in dollars, and get the change in pesos. Baggers are not paid by the grocery stores and gringos are very much appreciated as big tippers. See this post by Q-Roo Paul for more info. The page also provides guidance on customs such as greeting people gas station attendants, servers, etc. We gringos tend to rudely request service without preliminaries. Our culture is in a perpetual hurry. Expect prices to increase in season and around the holidays. A traveler who dropped by my house last month said he paid for 30 gallons and his tank only holds 22, and he probably only needed 10 or 15 gallons. He remembered that the attendant distracted him with some confusing conversation as he started the pump. Attendants will often round out the amount, more or less. Tip the person who cleans your windscreen five pesos or so. This is often a different unpaid person than the Pemex employee who fills your tank. Gas appears where you need it: At the El Rosario Pemex, one or two of the attendants sometimes have fossils to sell. Fresh, sticky, sweet, and a great energy snack! Camping Baja is a free camping paradise. If you see a homestead, go ask permission. If not, just do it. Many motorcyclists passing through have great stories of remote camping and positive interaction with the local people. Accepting Hospitality If you find yourself an unexpected guest at a remote homestead settle in and enjoy yourself. Money is generally rebuffed. If you offer it for para cerveza or Coca-Cola it may reluctantly be accepted. Gifts, however, are welcome. T-shirts, hats, stickers, tiny flashlights, cosmetics for women. One woman who visits each year brings little clear zippered bags with lipstick, nail polish, and eyeshadow. Another takes rolls of stickers to hand out to the kids. Drinking the Water I brush my teeth, open my mouth while showering, eat lettuce, ice cream, and feel okay about drinks with ice. In the tourist areas in the north, the water is treated. In the south, the water is beautifully clean. It flows from the high mountains on the spine of the peninsula, seeps into underground aquifers, and is piped into populated areas. Lomotil and Pepto Bismol will usually do the trick. Low-tech planisphere for Baja degrees latitude. I had to call and troubleshoot with the customer service rep for quite a while to figure this out. Repairs There are good tire repair shops everywhere llanteras and big shops with new tire and wheel installation in the big towns, including in Loreto. Give them a few pesos to air your tires up or down. Or do it yourself with this gadget. Which is why, in my travels around the world, I have always preferred a carbureted vehicle over one with fuel injection. You may have heard of the Green Angels , a bilingual crew that patrols the Baja roadways. However, they stick to the toll roads in Baja Norte. As my friend Sara found out last year, you are more likely to get help from a Mexican than a gringo in a fancy rig. We are in a hurry, we gringos! In the dark, in an area with no shoulder, we pushed one father and daughter in a battered car to a turnout with our Land Cruiser. Truckers sometimes break down and need a ride. I have picked them up even when driving solo. They just want a ride to the next place another trucker is likely to be. I always keep cereal bars and water in my truck. Last year I stopped at the roadside to help a Mexican family who waved me down frantically. Their car was parked with their hood up. I had tools and an air compressor but they declined my help, saying they needed money. They hung on my truck as I drove away. Since then, especially when solo, I keep my doors locked and my windows high enough to prevent easy access while I evaluate the situation. Stop and give them more water and any extra food, if you have it. They may ask for a lift. Use your judgment and your olfactory senses to decide.

Chapter 2 : Dance Etiquette

Both men and women may ask someone for a dance. The classical phrasing is "May I have this dance? So just ask for a dance! However, the local lindy hop clique is an unpleasant exception; most will not dance with anyone except their fellow cliquesters. Normally, one asks at the beginning of a song. Also, during the song, switch back to Closed Position from time to time. Always ask one particular person to dance. Do not go up to 2 people standing together and ask, "Would either of you care to dance? This is the Voice of Bitter Experience talking at ya -- from both ends of the experience. Sometimes the only reasonable option is to go up to 2 or more people standing together and ask "Would any of you like to dance? Just stand there and keep smiling, and eventually someone will say yes. If you want to say no to someone who asks you to dance, do so. Etiquette explicitly says that you do not have to give reasons, despite the strong American predilection for doing so. Something like, "No thank you, not just now; perhaps later" works fine. You can keep saying it all night if you have to. Add a smile to cushion the blow. Then wait out the whole song gracious classical approach -- or at least 20 seconds modern approach -- before you dash onto the dance floor with someone else. If someone declines to dance with you, accept it graciously. If he or she offers an excuse, pretend to believe it. For example, if you get rejected right after a fast song, chances are the person is genuinely fatigued. Wait about two songs and then ask again. You might want to use the Rule that someone once told us was standard amongst the Country Club set in which he grew up: If it happens once, it might just be a random accident. In our dance classes, we actually practice this business 3 or 4 times, to get those weird initial repetitions out of the way -- it should be a part of your natural behavioral repertoire, not some theoretical construct that you have never used. Most casual injuries in Swing happen at two points: Some men -- and far too many women! Worse, many Ladies were never taught good arm skills super-short summary: Same principle applies if you are being fondled in ways you dislike: How can you know if the groping was intended or accidental? Trust your feelings, Luke -- you will be correct In case you are wondering, this was NEVER correct for ballroom styles, and every guy on the planet knows this. If it happens, you are being groped. We strongly encourage the victims of gropers to say something: And to everyone else you know. And you could have prevented it. Gents, never move or kick backwards until you check that the area there is unoccupied! Usually, it happens halfway through a move that started out forward, so you are not as attentive to danger as usual -- get attentive! However, the time for finding a new partner between songs is so short these days, that most partners prefer that you skip this bit. Dance one song with someone, then change partners. Maybe two in a row, but not more than that. We have no idea why, but this seems to be the way it works around here. Overcome your shyness and do it. And it makes everyone a better dancer sooner, which means more fun the next time out. Dancing with someone LESS skilled than you. Come back to those one or two things until your partner is comfortable with them. Always try to make your partner look and feel like a terrific dancer. Do all instructing on the sidelines, by the way, never on the dance floor. Dancing with someone MORE skilled than you. Suppress the urge to apologize, except maybe once per song just to get it out of your system. See you on the dance floor! We would love to hear from you.

But building a mutual partnership can be especially tricky when you are dealing with people from different cultures. Understanding international business etiquette, or the unwritten rules of behavior, has become increasingly important in this ever-closer business atmosphere. The following guide will help you understand what etiquette is and how important it is for people working in the business world. The aim is to help you be better prepared for international business meetings. Etiquette is an important part of social interactions and there are different etiquette rules for different situations. This guide looks into business etiquette, which refers to an unwritten code of conduct for business situations. It involves special rules that you should follow when you are conducting business, whether at a formal business meeting or a more informal meeting for networking and the like. It is about navigating through the world of business in countries that operate differently when it comes to talking about deals, shaking hands and exchanging business cards. Netiquette is the unique term to cover the set of unwritten rules you should follow when doing business over virtual mediums. This could be a guideline on how to write a good e-mail to your business partners or how to conduct business relations on social media. Why is etiquette so important? Both etiquette and netiquette are crucial for professional success. The ability to behave and conduct business in a respectful and efficient manner can naturally improve your ability to land important business deals or to even find a new company to work for, if you are looking for a different direction for your professional career. Good business etiquette helps leave a good impression. This shows the other person you have respect toward them and you value the professional situation. Good business etiquette becomes even more important if you are dealing with people from different cultures and countries. Each country has its own unique business etiquette and by knowing the country-specifics, you can show deep respect toward your business partners. Understanding international business etiquette is not difficult and it can be extremely fun to learn new things about the countries of the world. The video below is a great introduction to etiquette in general and why it matters: In addition, if you are heading out to a specific region or a country for business, you can do in-depth research based on the following key areas. The key differences in cultures you need to understand

Gender roles When it comes to international business, gender roles can cause a lot of confusion. Understanding the appropriate gender etiquette can help you avoid uncomfortable situations. Most often, gender roles are about personal boundaries and physical contact with men and women. Furthermore, older generations in countries like Japan are not often comfortable shaking hands with Western women. If you are a woman traveling or you know there will be women at the business meeting, it is important to come to grips with the gender roles to navigate meetings in a respectful manner and to prepare yourself for how you might be approached in the country.

Personal space Personal space varies with respect to gender, but personal space is important in other contexts as well. In general, South American countries can be a lot more physical, even in a business context, than Asian countries. Naturally, there are differences within countries in the same continent. For example, European nations are very different when it comes to personal space.

The alcohol culture Food and drink are a big part of doing business these days. In many countries, a business dinner or lunch is part of the deal making process, so it is important to understand the food and drink culture of the country you are travelling to. Even countries such as Australia, where drinking is not unusual after work, drinking during business meetings is discouraged. On the other hand, in Russia, sharing a drink with your business partners can help establish a closer relationship.

Business gifts When it comes to doing business, handing out gifts is often considered a lovely thing to do. But countries and cultures vary greatly on what type of gifts are considered appropriate. In many Western countries, gifts can often be considered inappropriate in the first place, while in Asia gifts are very much expected. Issues surrounding the business culture

Finally, you should be aware of the specific differences in the business culture within countries and cultures. There are great differences in cultures when it comes to the way you conduct business and maintain relationships. If you want your international business relationships to flourish, you need to master the specific aspects of the business culture. To master appropriate business etiquette in the business culture, focus on the following themes: While shaking hands in the US is considered respectful, in Japan, a simple bow might be considered more respectful. Business cards – There are some cultures where the handing out business cards is especially important and in many cultures there are unwritten rules as to when and where you are able to hand out the cards. For instance, Japan takes business cards almost ceremonially, whereas Italians do not like exchanging business cards outside of business functions. Talking about deals – Whereas you might be able to get straight to the point in countries like Germany, there are many cultures, such as many Arab countries, where you need to keep it casual for a long time before starting to talk business. While many Western countries can be very direct during business meetings without considering it rude, in other cultures you need to be very careful in how you decline things. If you are traveling to any of these countries or doing business with people from these countries, these etiquette tips are crucial to keep in mind. Asia China Provide a gift for the person you are conducting business with but keep the following in mind: When handing out the gift always use both hands. Avoid black, blue or white wrapping paper. Chinese people will decline the gift three times, but you need to insist they take it. When you are provided with a gift, you should do the same. Chinese people appreciate a conservative dress code and you should avoid physical contact while conversing. If you happen to have family roots in China, you can give yourself a Chinese name to use when doing business in the country. This is considered a sign of respect, but you should only do it if you have Chinese roots or you have moved to the country to do long-term business. After a business meeting, allow Chinese partners to leave the meeting room first. Japan In Japan, bowing is a typical way of greeting each other. Handshakes sometimes occur but you should let the Japanese person initiate it. The business meeting is often led by the senior member in the group, while younger members converse less out of respect. Furthermore, similarly positioned people in different groups should sit across from each other. Junior position employees should never sit across from senior employees. Giving gifts is common, but you should pay special attention to how you present your gift. Avoid eating beef at business meetings! Latin America Brazil Business meetings often last longer than planned, but do not leave before the meeting has officially ended. Leaving early is considered rude. In Brazil, physical contact during conversation is natural and highlights the trust between business partners. Unlike in India, eating with your hands in Brazil should be avoided. Germany Business events are well-structured and straight to the point. Be punctual and on time – Germans are hardworking, so you want to highlight your respect toward this attitude. When entering business meetings, allow the oldest person to enter the room first. North America The United States You can conduct business even outside meetings – for instance, Americans often talk business over breakfast, lunch or dinner. Canada Like Germans, Canadians are punctual and being on time is considered a sign of respect. Oceania Australians are quite relaxed about the dress code, even in business meetings. New Zealand Be on time for business meetings and come early if possible. During a meal, conversing should be kept to a minimum and continued after the meal is eaten. You need to approach international business travel carefully and make sure you prepare yourself well for doing business with people from different cultures. If you are appropriately prepared, you can have much more success with your business ventures. How should you start your preparations? Here are a few crucial tips to help you get started. As soon as you know where you are doing business, start learning about the culture. Learning about the culture will give you an advantage and it shows a lot of respect toward your hosts as well. Even if you end up making small mistakes, you can recover a lot by showing real interest toward the culture. Understanding the key things about the culture will also help you feel more relaxed and confident – you can just focus on the essential, which is doing business! Use the above key themes as your guide when you are doing research. You can even jot down some notes about the key points and go over them while you are flying to your destination. Second, it is important to keep focused on the purpose of the meeting. Learn the etiquette to ensure you understand what the meeting is all about. This also encompasses the understanding of how much business you are supposed to talk at the official business meeting. If you are doing business in the Middle East, for example, official business meetings might involve quite a bit of small talk, while in countries like Germany you get straight to the point. You also need to understand how you should keep in touch after the business meeting. Sometimes a card and a gift to say thank you will be required, but sometimes a simple e-mail will do. The importance of correct and respectful behavior is enormous and it could be the difference between success and failure. It is crucial to start preparing yourself early and learn enough about the specific country before you must travel or meet partners from these countries. Be mindful of the differences in the culture and try to showcase great understanding and interest toward the specific culture. Good preparation should keep you safe, but if you happen to upset your business partners, apologize and explain yourself. If you are conducting long-term business in a specific country, learning the language can often be beneficial and it will enhance your understanding of the business culture.

Baptism Etiquette Knowing a little baptism etiquette can make you feel much more at ease at an event in which many people have little experience. Baptism gift etiquette and having good etiquette and manners prepared never hurts. A baptism represents a religious event. A child is being received into the church and congregation. This is a little different from a christening in which a child traditionally receives his or her name. Note, however, that many baptisms combine these two into one affair. Other names sometimes used for a baptism include a Naming Ceremony and a Dedication. These two alternatives may or may not be religious in nature, but serve a similar purpose of greeting the child and welcoming him or her into the extended family. Invitation protocol instructs mailing the invitations about four weeks before the event. This gives family and friends from out of town enough time to plan their travels. As far as attendees go, close friends and family members, and their partners or children usually litter the invitation list. Either the parents of the newborn or the godparents take care of sending invitations. If there is a reception following the event, the invitation should include an address and directions for people unfamiliar with the area. As with other formal occasions, remember avoiding abbreviations on the outside and inside of the invitation. Personalize and sign them. Keep in mind that the vast majority of baptisms occur in churches – keep it simple and tasteful nothing too flashy. Thus the phrase, "born with a silver spoon. The parents of the child should donate money to the officiant and potentially also the church. You want to know what, if anything, is expected of guests. Religious ceremonies often include group movements, words, or singing. If you keep your eyes on people in front of you, and do your best to follow along, Miss Manners will be pleased. Your baptism etiquettes shines from a joyful heart. Let that guide you. Baptism Invitations Here is a selection of baptism invitations.
