Life[edit] She was born in Rangoon currently Yangon , Burma into a Scottish timber and rice-trading family. Her early years were in the hands of a German nanny , and the initial intention was that she should be sent to Berlin to complete her education. The deteriorating political climate between Britain and Germany led to a late switch to Britain instead at the age of six, ending up at Bedales School “ Unable to study English Literature , because she was never taught Latin or Greek , she took a diploma in journalism at London University “ , [1] and wrote two novels under her own name in the early s, when she met and married her first husband. She separated from her first husband and lived with Robert Brown in Belsize Park , London, from However, she did not obtain a divorce and marry Brown until October She remained on friendly terms with her first husband, who also remarried. In she and her new husband moved to Cornell University in the USA, where her husband had been offered a post. Notwithstanding the financial attraction of such a posting in austerity postwar Britain, they returned a year later owing to the atmosphere of McCarthyism. Having seen the rise of fascism in Europe, they were disturbed by witch-hunts against many writers and academics accused of communist sympathies. She was inducted into the famed Detection Club in From , when her husband was appointed Regius Professor of Botany at the University of Edinburgh , until shortly after his retirement in they lived in Edinburgh. Citing the long, cold winters as a reason, they then moved south to the village of Blewbury in Oxfordshire, where they lived contentedly together until her sudden death in She professed no religious faith and was probably instrumental in turning her husband from distinct evangelism in the s towards agnosticism. She was buried in Blewbury in a non-religious ceremony. Her final novel, A Thief in the Night, was published posthumously in She was survived by a nephew, Peter MacTaggart. In the United States, her novels were published under the name E. Late in her career, she began writing about a semi-estranged married couple, Virginia and Felix Freer, and a retired botanist , Andrew Basnett. Several of her short stories also feature an elderly detective called Jonas P. Her plots were worked out in detail in hand-written notebooks before being filled out in typed manuscript; she said that they were worked backwards from the denouement. Like every writer, she based characters and situations on people she knew and things she had seen in real life. She travelled with her husband when his academic career required, for example to Adelaide where he was a visiting professor at the University of South Australia , and on holidays specially to Madeira , which they loved.
