Photography by Linda Gayle Parker. Wednesday, May 8, Quintessential Pioneer Square: I have been working with documentary photography for a month or two, and undertook an assignment to photograph a neighborhood in Seattle, Washington. My images were shot on an overcast day, inside and outside, ranging from the well known and loved Victorian pergola, to Occidental Park, the Underground Tour, past restaurants, clubs, galleries, shops, and services for the homeless and disadvantaged. This is a neighborhood where the ghosts and sites of the past collide with the tourism and commerce of the present, where the well-heeled and the homeless tread the same streets and sidewalks, and where night and day are as different as, well, night and day. Please join me on a visual tour of Pioneer Square Bread of Life Mission, with an ironic sign for happy hour, in the foreground. Ironic sights are common here Raindrops on a chessboard, in Occidental Park. There are a group of stone chessboards here, for enjoyment and use on sunny days Memorial statues and beams dedicated to the fallen firefighters of Seattle, in Occidental Park Tlingit totem pole in foreground, Pioneer Building in background. Merchants Cafe, with a member of the staff taking a break. This is the oldest restaurant in Seattle, in operation since Stone, carved lion head and architectural detail on a beautiful terra cotta-colored building in Pioneer Square This guy looks like he is ready to be off-duty! Turns out, it was the horse who wanted a break from work! Detail of old, brick wall and windows, from one of the main rooms on the Seattle Underground Tour This is detail of a very old, copper bathtub, as seen in the Seattle Underground Doorways and portals exist where you least expect them sometimes. A very old door frame and the edge of a trellis, in the Underground Loved this old but colorful sign, lying amidst the rubble in a corner. I held my camera through a random window into darkness, set it for manual focus, turned on the flash, and here is what I got, a secret stairway, rising into a solid ceiling above! Hope you have enjoyed this short tour of Pioneer Square. I had a blast walking around for five hours taking pictures. See you next time!
