Given the fact that instruments of exercising responsibility within chains of financial and information intermediation vary from screening for best-in-class, over the a priori exclusion of certain corporate activities by means of law or voluntarily to a wide range of engagement processes, how is the effectiveness of each to be evaluated? Which institutions have geared RI innovation in the last decade? Is it likely that they will continue to do so or are new innovators emerging? How can we measure the impact of RI? More precisely, what does it impact on, how can we know this impact and how can we report the impact? And if one or the other, through what mechanisms? And is it even relevant – were best-in-class screens ever meant to fulfil this purpose? The failure of mainstream or credit rating agencies is obvious. It might be attributed to greed, stupidity, system design, lacking regulation, incompetent oversight and so on. Do different responsibilities arise with different types of investors small, large, universal investor? What are the ethical possibilities and responsibilities of the distinct functions in the process of financial intermediation? How to govern these?
