The Prophet went to see the husband, admonished him for being too engrossed in religious prayer and instructed him to, erm, pay more attention to his bride. This openness has been lost over time, and discussions about sex have become taboo. However, things are slowly changing. Sexual Guidance for Married Couples, on how to achieve sexual intimacy with your partner, stating couples needed the advice. Her book was blessed by the mufti of the UAE. But she received intense criticism. The one day training included an hour about sex. Jenny is an Irish Muslim organising a similar two part seminar for young women only, the first on marriage, the second on intimacy. Nomani says she received negative feedback about the bill. But when I read about it I remember thinking, this is not in the least controversial or new for Islam. But push on I will. There is a lack of research about the existing levels of sexual knowledge among Muslims. How much do they know? Where do they gain their knowledge? And perhaps the most difficult to ask: And last year in the US, an anthology of true courtship stories written by Muslim women was published delightfully entitled Love, Inshallah God willing. Amongst the narratives there were those that were sexually explicit and spoke about sex both inside and outside marriage. Whilst the book itself was extremely popular, its comparatively graphic nature drew positive feedback as well as criticism. But the more important point of both books is that Muslim women themselves are trying to open a discussion about sexuality, its role in their identity, and their fears and aspirations. For those Muslims who want to live a chaste life, the pressures are immense. Our surroundings are notoriously sexualised. Virginity is seen as freakish. For teen Muslims, these challenges must be particularly difficult. If contextually appropriate teachings are not available “ whether at home, in the mosque or in other social settings “ then the taboos about sexuality become entrenched, lead to diminished knowledge, and pleasure or even negativity about sex. So where should a young or even old! Muslim turn to for sexual teachings that they feel are in line with an Islamic perspective. Courses like the one being run by Jenny are few and far between. And those willing to discuss matters openly are equally rare. And to even begin such discussions, what is needed is a healthy dose of facing up to the fact that how Muslims live their lives is not necessarily the same as the Islamic ideals they aspire to. A famous Islamic traditional teaching about sexual pleasure says that when God created desire, He made it into ten parts. He gave nine parts to women, and just one to men. One was a professor of mine. This relationship was strange because, as soon as we had sex, she told her husband. He laughed and said he hoped she was having a good time. I was 18 and the fact that this was his response made me feel my youth and feel how strange the world is. Almost as soon as the woman had told her husband I lost my interest in her. The fact that it was in the open made the relationship real and so, to me, feel leaden with responsibility. Another affair was with the wife of a friend. This is the relationship that I feel saddest about, because I hurt somebody who was important to me. When I could not find a married woman to sleep with I tried to create drama for myself by going out with women who had boyfriends or with whom I worked. The discretion these situations required felt very much like an affair. Sometimes when none of these conditions prevailed, I would tell the woman I was seeing not to let anyone know we were dating. I would tell her I preferred people not knowing my business, while in reality I just liked secrets. I am not sure when I decided that the loneliness of going out with married women, the sense of being invisible that I experienced when I met their husbands and the sense of not being able to plan my schedule because I was always waiting for small windows of availability all became too much. I do know that by the time I was in my mid-twenties I could not bear it. A part of me found the gradualness of all of this irritating, like sipping wine when you are used to a swig of hard liquor. A part of me also found that these ordinary relationships made me more vulnerable. When I was sleeping with a married woman I knew absolutely that the woman was risking herself for me and so I was important. With a woman who was my peer there was always a sense of uncertainty because the fact that she valued me seemed beyond belief. I have been married now for 13 years. There are good days and bad days. There are even good years and bad years. Usually this is worth it.
