The artist, Captain Scott, has long relieved the monotony of Indian life by the use of his camera in that country. Those who exercise the art know the difficulties that the Photographer has to overcome in taking Photographic pictures in India, and will accord Captain Scott the great praise due to.

The point is not to create great art obviously, in my case but to look and to see in a new way, and then to have a souvenir that is way better than a t-shirt. A bunch of scribbles, really, but it gives me such joy. So grab a sketchbook and a pen, and maybe a little watercolor set, and come along. Or better yet, banish them. It is most always hazy and cloudy in Delhi, a combination of pollution and fog. Or pollution and pollution. The Gandhi Museum with a new gift shop! Gandhi was assassinated here, shot at point blank as he stood speaking to visitors during his daily afternoon walk in the garden. Staffed and run by volunteers, the kitchen prepares three meals a day, plus tea! They serve the poor, yes, but not exclusively. The diners gather in a large open room and sit in long rows on the floor. Okay Cracker Barrel was so random. It was a Sunday and a holiday and the traffic, oy. It cut waaaay into the shopping time. The Amber Fort was also where we lost His Grace, which did not suit him or us. I love elephants, and that is not a political statement. But then again something about riding an elephant was irresistible. So much for noble intents. And the story behind it, oh my heavens. Oh, and later he cut off the head of his brother and sent it to his father, whom he had imprisoned. But this building, in the misty morning we visited, is other-worldly. Waiting for the train I did not mention that part of our trip was by train. But it was not worth what the cost, period. Hello, there is usually a reason for that, and the reason is it sucks. And it did not suit His Grace one bit. But before you get out your violin, the rest of the trip was very swish. This is the place where they have all the sculptures and friezes depicting the Kama Sutra, yes that one. The guide said they were the largest in the world. A ramp one kilometer long was built up to the roof, and the elephants marched up one by one and stayed a week. The Monsoon Palace in Udaipur. I loved Udaipur and the lakes. The Monsoon Palace is so-called because it is high atop a mountain, and the clouds go through it. All the furniture is waterproof. No I made that up. I changed the pace of my sketching too, opting for a pencil drawing with a bit of watercolor wash. Or Mama was would hunt. The cubs would probably just goof off. Especially if they were boys. A Rebari shepherd in Jawai. You could tell which region someone was from by the turban he wore. Encroaching adoption of Western dress has diminished the custom except among the Sikhs, making the bright red turbans worn by the Rebari shepherds around Jawai all the more distinctive. I was dying for one. A turban, not a shepherd. The ca-razy fabulous Clocktower Market of Jodhpur. Jodhpur, with its magnificent fort and sea of blue houses, was our last stop. One day, on the curb surrounding the tower, sat a man sewing. The Uttar Pradesh school judo team, and me, Picasso-not.
