A group of middle-school kids in Brooklyn, New York are the only ones who can see a benevolent, amnesiac ghost, whom they dub Ghostwriter. He can only see and communicate through writing, and uses his abilities to help the kids solve mysteries. The show never made it clear who Ghostwriter was, or why he chooses to help people. His abilities, by contrast, were extremely well-defined. His spying often made the perp obvious very quickly, but the kids then had to find other evidence that would be admissible in court – with a few exceptions. Each mystery was a four-part episode, except for the premiere "Ghost Story" and "To The Light," which were five-parters. Presumably because of PBS censorship codes, almost all violence on the show happened off-camera. This made the show painfully slow and talky most of the time, but some scenes were scary nail-biters. For instance, in the "Who Is Max Mouse?" In an equally scary arc, one of the kids suffered chemical poisoning from improperly discarded dry-cleaning chemicals near a playground that the characters frequently visited and her friends discover in their research that the effects of this poison are potentially lethal. The villains ranged from eccentrics to raving nutcases, and were fascinating – too much so, as they made the heroes look bland. Some episodes managed elaborate mysteries without any villain at all. Not recommended for anyone over the age of twelve, but worth seeing for how the writers managed to create tension without much on-screen violence or if you grew up with the show and see well it was back then to now. Not to be confused with a literary ghostwriter, defined by That Other Wiki as "a writer who writes books, articles, stories, reports, or other texts that are officially credited to another person" which frequently overlaps with Extruded Book Product. Also not to be confused with the film The Ghost Writer. This show provides examples of: The "Over a Barrel" arc. Your kids helping out in an inner-city community garden can only be good, right? Nothing more frightening for a parent than having to deal with the possibility of your son getting into drugs. And to her, this is a completely foreign country. A general one that was present in the TV show but cropped up a lot in the books:

By Margo Greenman Tacoma is brimming with beautiful architecture, historic homes and iconic landmarks. But, while admiring the many impressive buildings and landscapes of our locale, some mysteries seem to fall through the cracks. Discover the paranormal history lurking behind some of the South Sounds allegedly haunted places, and decide for yourself whether these places are local haunts, or merely hosts to myth and legend. The miniseries, which was filmed in , follows a fictional psychology professor and her team of psychics as they set out to collect data proving paranormal activity exists in a presumably haunted mansion. While the movie is strictly fictional, rumor has it that Thornewood Castle, located in Lakewood, has had its own encounters with the paranormal. Accounts of strange figures, footsteps, flickering lights and other strange occurrences have all been documented, suggesting that the more than year-old mansion serves up its own set of thrills. Pacific Brewing and Malting Co. The two buildings, which were joined by a jail cell, have been rumored to be haunted by the ghost of a serial killer named Jake Bird. Bird, who was arrested after murdering two people with an axe, was sentenced to death after confessing to more than 40 murders. It is believed that Bird still haunts the building. The hospital, which was built on the historic site of Fort Steilacoom , was originally known as the Fort Steilacoom Asylum. When the Fort was abandoned by the federal government in , the territory of Washington purchased the abandoned post and began construction of the Insane Asylum of Washington Territory, which opened in . In the years that followed, the number of patients being treated at the hospital increased and a larger facility was needed. Additional out buildings were constructed to accommodate the greater need and in the early s the hospital was renamed Western State Hospital. The hospital was revered as one of the best of its kind. In the early s, the hospital erected Hill Ward, which served as housing for the more than patients who worked on the farm. However, as the years went by, concerns surrounding the hospital raised some red flags. In response to this, the decades that followed included some drastic changes at the hospital. Outdated lobotomy procedures were replaced with more modern therapies including counseling and psychotropic drugs, patients who died were buried with graves indicating their name, birth and death year, and a deteriorating Hill Ward was partially demolished. Hill Ward, which is located at Fort Steilacoom Park , remained partially demolished until the early s. High school students and ghost hunters flocked to the ruins to explore the underground boiler room which was rumored to be haunted. However, around , Hill Ward began attracting gang activity, drug use and other crimes. In , the ruins of Hill Ward were obliterated. The spot â€™ popular for walking, running, biking, picnicking and other outdoor recreation â€™ is also rumored to be haunted by the ghost of a teenage girl. In the mid s, a Tacoma girl went missing. Her body was later found on the Five Mile Drive by a group of joggers. In the years that followed, eerie sightings of a girl on a bike began to trickle in from joggers, bikers and other visitors of the forested destination. Point Defiance Park boasts another allegedly haunted location. The Pagoda , which was built at the turn of the 20th century, originally served as a trolley terminal. Now, a popular venue for weddings and other events, the Pagoda has been the site of many bizarre occurrences.

To Catch a Creep parodies how politicians ran smear campaigns in elections in the United States. In Episode 2 of Into the Comics, Jamal looks at a yearbook, and comments how people dress out of date quickly. Ghostwriter is definitely a Unintentional Period Piece from the s. Not to mention the guy himself. When she gets to say more than hi, she talks fast and rambly, and at one point talks about trying talking to her a second pitch at being in her video, actually with lines that sounded like someone trying to ask out a crush. The mystery of the arc is introduced only in the closing moments of part one; the rest is entirely Tina positively drooling over this girl and stopping at nothing to get her attention. A good example is Manny Gite from "Into the Comics". He was an awkward twentysomething who lived with his aunt and desperately wanted to be a cartoonist. He was embittered when his first comic was rejected by a comic book company, but refused to give up his dream. So in an desperate attempt to achieve this, he entered a contest for kids in which the prize was getting to be in a comic book disguised as his cartoon character Stoopdude and tried to sabotage the other contestants. Can you jam with the console cowboys in Cyberspace? Ever experienced the New Wave? He really came out of his shell. Goopy Gus is the most remembered example of this one the show, to the point where him and the story featuring him is a commonly repressed memory for many who were traumatized by this as children. Calvin was a Jerkass but his devastation at losing his beloved parrot is pretty sad, especially for people who have also experienced the death of a pet. Then Rob gets hit again when his dad transfers the family to Australia. Instead Rob leaves and some members of the fanbase hate on Hector for replacing him. Somehow, his ghost ended up inside a book for years until Jamal freed him in the pilot.
