Old Discussion[edit] I would respectfully disagree with at least one point in this article. The first movement, it seems to me, actually has just the usual two main themes of a sonata structure; what the writer calls "second theme" is really just part of the whole first-theme area. Both the first theme and the solo bassoon melody what I view as the second theme have various subsidiary, "satellite" themes that turn up here and there, so that the British sonata-form usage of "first group" and "second group" really suits this movement. The first A in two parts lasts up to the first galop material; B a suite of dances from that point to the gentle waltz-style reappearance on the flute of the descending two-note motive from the first allegro music of the movement; and A from that point to the conclusion. The mirroring happens at the "edges" of the movement: Sorry I do not have the score at hand to provide measure numbers or rehearsal figures to clarify the points I refer to. I will not bore you with a further re-hash of that material here; anyone who cares can look it up through the Boston University libraries. This article is very unfortunate. It would be a good thing if someone gave it at least a major trimming. And did you also add the reference Spencer, William The Fourth Symphony of Dmitri Shostakovich: Boston University to this article? Presumably your thesis includes a bibliography. Rather than cite your thesis, I think it may be more helpful for you to cite works your thesis cites. There are many cases -- not so much with major works by major composers, but elsewhere in the music literature -- where they are the main sources. I think listing it is fine. This sounds to me very much like fairly blatant self-promotion. El Chileno Chido Or is the one listed supposed to be with the NSO? Also, I believe Rozhdestvensky made three different recordings but there are only two listed. This live performance from was issued in a three disc box set from the Andante label. The other one is another "live" performance this time with Rozhdestvensky conducting the Vienna Philharmonic. If I remember correctly, the CD stated that the recording was from I know Rozhdestvensky was principal or guest conductor of the Vienna Symphony Orchestra around this time. Is there anybody who can confirm that Rozhdestvensky performed with the VPO around this time? The latter was particularly unfortunate as the Fourth Symphony is a work that cries out for stereo sound. I am pleased to announce then that the recent remasterings by Aulos Classics and Melodiya of the same set is a substantial improvement. Of the two sets, I slightly prefer the sound on the Aulos release but the Melodiya set includes valuable recordings of The Sun Shines Over the Motherland, October, and a white hot Execution of Stepan Razin in addition to the symphonies. To be honest, both sets sound quite good and either one would be an essential investment. If singly, is there a way to tell from the packaging which are the Aulos versions and which the Melodiya versions? I can go through just about any WP article I want and remove every instance of the letter "e" with impunity. Something like the Penguin guide cannot be changed in that way; only the editors and the publisher can do so. I have resigned myself to having lists of recordings included in WP, but I still feel that any list that is not genuinely complete cannot be described as "notable" or "recommended" or anything else. I happen to think that the Naxos recording listed is not really worth much to anyone, but someone else may be head-over-heels in love with it. So since they are not there are they not notable? As Dame Edith Sitwell once said somewhere or other, "There is no such thing as truth, there are only points of view. I was rather new to WP and immature when I wrote the above paras. However, I am certainly for including lists of recordings. If the recordings you mentioned are not included, why not go ahead and add them? If you think the Naxos recording is not worth much, well, remove it. As for the rest, well, I guess we must credit the reader with some level of intelligence whether to take something or anything on WP seriously or not, eg. Let each of us decide for ourselves what to believe and what not to believe, as we do for any written and published material. See also discussion on Talk: Rozhdestvensky did perform the Fourth later during the same tour of England and I do believe the orchestra he first played the work with was the Philharmonia. I wonder if Klemperer heard the work then or had heard about it all and if so, what were his thoughts? The recording of that concert was just issued by the BBC. The Sporty Jew I used the published score, which I would think is the definitive source for this information; the earlier list referred to CD liner notes and referred to them very well. Anyone who wants to should clean up my mangled reference I assume that the published score you refer is this one? If not, there is also the pocket score, I believe. If the aforementioned score is indeed the one referenced, I or someone else could most certainly compile a citation for it. I know there was a later Soviet edition from the s sometime, and the collected edition score from about , but I do not know the Boosey score. They have had a relationship with something called the Anglo-Soviet Music Press but I know nothing about what that is. A bit of digging outside of Wikipedia yielded that most citation methods indicate that musical scores should be cited like books. Is this the Collected Works edition? My own referrence scores of this symphony are the Kalmus reprint of the Muzyka edition and the new Collected Works edition edited by Manushir Yabukov. I have never heard of a Kondrashin edition. I have also not heard of any collected edition aside from the one from the early 80s I admit to not having kept up that closely with the recent publishing history of the work but I would be somewhat surprised if there were another collected edition so soon after the first one. I changed the article back to how Wspender11 left it back in January as I believe a lot of dreck was inserted afterwards and a lot of pieces of insight were sadly left out. Shostakovich was not nearly finished with the symphony as the most recent version of thi article had stated. In fact, Shostakovich mentioned to his friends that he was dragging his heels with this symphony. If I recall correctly, Shostakovich had either not started the finale yet or was just getting around to composing it when the Pravda article showed up. Anyway, I believe the old version of the article was just fine. If Shostakovich did say this himself, we need a citation. If the citation is from Testimony, bear in mind that the authenticity of Testimony is greatly controversial, and rather than footnote it, it would be better to say in the article itself something like "according to Testimony TheScotch talk "€"Preceding comment was added at He went so far as to copy out parts of the score. The Sporty Jew talk Again, the influence of the Mahler Third on the Shostakovich Fourth is not speculation on the part of musicologists. It is fact - the composer himself admitted it and this has been referenced in the aformentioned writings. When I have time, I will place the citations in the article myself. There really need to be footnotes, however, so that readers not as knowledgable on this point know from where your point initiated. I do wish, though, that the article itself were more polished. Just because Boris Schwarz or " Ian MacDonald " or Solomon Volkov say something does not make it so, especially when it comes to analytical questions. His classical training was close to non-existent from what I can gather, and while his Shostakovich-related writing is typically very vivid, highly characterized, and quite effective on its own terms, I believe it tells us far more about "MacDonald" than it does about DSCH because it is so blatantly speculative. Sad, because this is a great, greatly important, and greatly misunderstood score. By doing so, I am not saying that DSCH did not insert such references into the symphony, I am only saying that any citation of a specific quotation or reference really should have details listed. Similarly with the list of recordings; I personally really loathe the whole notion of WP being a place to include discographies. I only wish every article with a recordings list would do the same. Once again this article has become bloated with empty conjecture and opinionating. Let me know what you people think. The alpaca herder talk Who designed this wack discography? Kondrashin recorded the symphony three times for Melodiya? But the farrago of errors, opinionizing, and sheer sloppiness that comprises so many of the classical music articles here is sad beyond words.
