Juan Manuel Ballesteros, the hearing director from to, enacted an "ableist" policy that barred deaf professors. At the same time, another hearing teacher, Francisco Fernández Villabril, wrote the first Spanish Sign Language dictionary.

US border policy increases migrant deaths fold in Arizona desert posted by Duke Reed In the mid-nineties US policy towards Mexico changed in two significant ways that eventually set the stage for the current "immigration crisis. At the same time, a new strategy was enacted along the southern border intended to stem the flow of unauthorized migrants. Additionally, border barriers were built along portions of the California and Texas border to prevent migrants from entering through the most highly trafficked urban areas. NAFTA, while bringing trade and investment to Mexico, has had unintended negative consequences on both sides of the border for working people and the poor. Whole segments of the US manufacturing sector have been relocated to Mexico resulting in job loss for US workers. At the same time, the lifting for trade restrictions in Mexico have allowed cheaper US commodities to enter the country, decimating Mexican agricultural markets and throwing millions of small farmers out of business. Additionally, the availability of even cheaper labor sources in places like China has forced manufacturing wages to go down. As for the policy of "prevention through deterrence", all it has really accomplished in the past thirteen years is a movement of the routes of migration from relatively safe urban areas like San Diego and El Paso to the hostile desert and mountainous regions where enforcement is difficult. This "funneling effect" of forcing migrants into least hospitable areas has had devastating effects for those on both sides of the border. A new study just released by the University Of Arizona examined the consequences of shifting migration patterns from California and Texas to Arizona and found it had increased migrants deaths by fold. Entire indigenous nations -- the Zapotecs, the Mixtecs, the Tzotzil Maya -- have moved by the tens of thousands, creating the largest migration of Native American peoples in North America since the Trail of Tears in the late 19th century. Migrant Deaths Increase Since , between and migrants have died trying to cross the inhospitable regions left unsecured after numerous security measures like "Operation Hold the Line", "Operation Safeguard", and "Operation Gatekeeper" were put in place - of those in Arizona. A national border enforcement strategy that funneled illegal immigrants through Southern Arizona from Texas and California led to a dramatic increase in illegal-entrant deaths in Southern Arizona, according to a University of Arizona study released Wednesday. The study by the Binational Migration Institute " paid for by in part by the Pima County Board of Supervisors " is not the first to reach that conclusion. Last year, the U. Government Accountability Office found that Arizona accounted for at least 78 percent of the increased Southwestern border deaths between and Over 80 percent of the unauthorized border-crosser bodies handled by the PCMEO have been under the age of 40, and there is a discernable, upward trend in the number of dead youth under the age of There also has been a statistically significant decrease in the number of recovered bodies of unauthorized border-crossers from northern Mexico and a significant increase in the number of such decedents from central and southern Mexico. American Immigration Law Institute Yet, despite the obvious failures of these two policies, policymakers insist on using them as a model for future programs. The Human Cost Lost in all the discussion of "unauthorized border crossers" and the death in the desert are the stories of those who never completed their journeys only to become statistics in any of the myriad of studies and reports on the topic. For instance there is the story of Antonio Torres Jimenez, a long-time Tucson resident, whose body was found in the desert in May of Antonio Torres Jimenez perished while coming back into Tucson from Mexico. They found him in less than 24 hours The reason Torres went back and forth across the border illegally? Torres returned to La Loma [Mexico] to be with his wife and remaining children. He lost his legal status. With few jobs back home, Torres continued living and working in Tucson. Fifteen-year-old Jesus Abran Buenrostro Dominguez memorized the silhouette of Baboquivari Peak as his mother lay dying on the desert floor. If he could remember where they were, maybe he could get help. His mother, year-old Lecrecia Luna Dominguez, died before he had the chance. Now all he wants is the chance to find her body and bring her home. Home is the small village of San Martin Sombrerete in Zacatecas. When Luna Dominguez fell ill on the third day of the journey, the group of village friends they were traveling with continued on with Nora. Jesus stayed behind to be with his mother. Tucson Citizen When she lost consciousness, Jesus struck out alone to try to find emergency help. Three days later, Border Patrol agents found him lost, wandering and disoriented in the desert. The humanitarian-aid group No More Deaths assisted him; Border Patrol officials helped for only one day. Binational Migration Institute These stories and thousands more just like them are the reality behind the statistics. Lucrecia Dominguez Luna is but one of the women whose death accounts for the two-thirds increase in female migrant deaths in recent years. Your heart pumps harder and harder to get fluid and oxygen to your organs. Empty vessels within you collapse. Your sweat runs out Your temperature redlines you hit , , degrees. Your body panics and dilated all blood capillaries near the surface, hoping to flood your skin with blood to cool it off. Your eyes turn red: Your skin gets terribly sensitive. It hurts, it burns. Your blood heats under your skin. Clothing feels like sandpaper. Some walkers at this point strip nude. But often, the clothing was eerily neat, carefully folded and left in nice little piles beside the corpses. Once underground, of course, they bake like a pig at a luau. They choke to death, their throats filled with rocks and dirt. Your muscles, lacking water, feed on themselves. They break down and start to rot. Once rotting in you, they dump rafts of dying cells into your already sludgy bloodstream. Proteins are peeling off your dying muscles. Chunks of cooked meat are falling out of your organs, to clog your other organs. They system closes down in a series. Your kidneys, your bladder, your heart. Do they think of the thousands of others who have come before them or the thousands more to come in the future? We will never know the stories behind each an every one of the migrant deaths that have occurred along the border. In fact, for many migrants, the details of their deaths will always remain nameless, faceless statistics. But thanks to the work done by the University of Arizona we can at least attach names to roughly one thousand of those who never completed the journey to el Norte. Perhaps they should be read aloud in the halls of Congress each time a new trade or immigration policy is debated
