Many of America's heroes never live to tell their story, but Philip Strachan did. Strachan is a former member of the infantry who was issued The Bronze Star in the Gulf War which took place from

The intervening twenty-three years have given us time to reconsider this conclusion. For some reason I was thinking about the years war and, thus, Agincourt. Agincourt was a crushing defeat for the French. Yet, due to other factors, the English victory was rather fleeting. Within a short time frame, what Agincourt wrought was undone. You need to be able to win the peace. No planning for a massive aid program. Flights of fancy or hand-waving. Rob in CT Another example: Roman sources state between 40k and 60k dead!! Rome was temporarily, at least practically defenseless, and many allies began deserting her. At this point, damn near anybody gives up. Or at least opens negotiations. Not the Romans, though. They freaked out for a few days and then set about raising more armies. Hannibal won victory after victory, but his brilliance was overcome by the fact that he was up against quite possibly the most stubborn people to ever walk the Earth. Hannibal had defeated the equivalent of eight consular armies 16 legions plus an equal number of allies. After Cannae, the Hellenistic southern provinces of Arpi, Salapia, Herdonia, Uzentum, including the cities of Capua and Tarentum two of the largest city-states in Italy revoked their allegiance to Rome and pledged their loyalty to Hannibal. And yet Rome won. Immediately after Cannae Hannibal sent a delegation led by Carthalo to negotiate a peace treaty with the Senate on moderate terms. Despite the multiple catastrophes Rome had suffered, the Senate refused to parley. Instead, they redoubled their efforts, declaring full mobilization of the male Roman population, and raised new legions, enlisting landless peasants and even slaves. Is that all wrong? As Caesar showed, that was a valid concern. Carthage, for whatever reason, failed to provide that over and over. Then, Hannibal asked his brother Hasdrubal to do it himself. The Romans gave Hannibal his severed head. Which makes him also not the sharpest knife in the drawer. Although, oddly, after the war was over, Hannibal was elected the leader of Carthage.
