Bernie Sanders in the primaries. With that, the emails offer a behind-the-scenes glimpse into how her administration might approach the climate crisis—and what policy measures could get left off the table. Nationalizing the fossil fuel industry. Like socialism, nationalization has been a taboo word in American politics since the Cold War and before, conjuring up images of disastrous five-year plans and authoritarianism. On Wall Street reform, for instance, advisors looked to foster a public common ground between the two candidates, arguing that Clinton had the more realistic plan to reign in the banking industry. Nationalizing fossil fuels For some, though, nationalization is not such a radical proposal. What the NSP lays out is quite a bit different. Instead, its creation is controlled by a series of computers housed in the Federal Reserve Bank. More importantly, those decisions rest with the White House-appointed officials who control those computers, like Fed Chairwoman Janet Yellen. Politicians—Clinton and Trump included—compete over who can cap spending and lower taxes the fastest and most fairly across income brackets, while meeting their budget priorities. Keeping warming below the 2 and 1. The benefits of such a buyout, then, would be two-fold: Bringing an end to a world-wrecking industry and kneecapping its ability to stymie the transition away from it. Ironically, the move might also result in a better deal overall for fossil fuel executives, who would receive the full value of their companies rather than waiting for them to wither away into bankruptcy under the weight of impending regulations and climate rules. The last time the U. Complimenting the proposal, Guinan suggests, would be a Green Investment Bank created by the Treasury and with bonds taken out by the Fed, using the European Investment Bank as a loose model. As Guinan admits, there are several pieces left to figure out about such a massive purchase, including its impact on financial markets and—perhaps most urgently—how to make it palatable to a political landscape defined by fear-mongering about deficits and entitlements. Welcome to Are you in? What do I do? It starts with you. You take care of you. You heal what troubles you. We may be troubled by the wars we see between groups of people, and wonder how that can happen, but justify the little wars we have with people around us. We may be outraged by the polluting of our environment, but willingly subject our bodies and minds to toxic material and information. The outside world, as you perceive it, is a mirror reflection of things that are going on inside of you. Wanna see the world change for the better? Commit to making positive changes in your own life. The world is made up of people. The more people who are troubled, the more the world seems troubled. Imagine if each person did their part by cleaning up their own little piece of the planet -- namely, themselves Now, does this mean we are being selfish -- just focusing on ourselves when we might feel there are bigger problems out there -- people who we might feel need more help? Each of us has gifts and talents that we are naturally compelled to share. The more personal freedom we create for ourselves, the more freely we share those gifts and talents. As you let go of what ails you, you will find yourself free to do more than you thought possible, and be of greater service than you imagined. If we did all the things we are capable of, we would literally astound ourselves. Edison So -- where do you start? What change would you most like to see first? If you want to see an end to poverty, work on healing your issues around abundance and the lack thereof. If you want to see an end to disease, work on improving your health. If you want to see an end to war, work to clear yourself of anger, and find peace within yourself, so that you can demonstrate it. If not right away, well, it may be a new way of thinking about it for you. But give it time, and it will. Now, this is certainly not intended to suggest that you give up any external efforts you are making on behalf of the world at large. Please contribute to the world and its people in whatever way is right for you!
