Because of complexities of exchange control and import and export regulationsâ€™ Penguin made the decision to terminate the association and the New American Library of World Literature was founded in [1] by Victor Weybright and Kurt Enoch formally head of Albatross Books. Enoch served as president of New American Library from Budlong became president of New American Library in Original works of mystery, romance, and adventure proved to be profitable and popular. In the company began publishing original publications in hardback format, [4] such as the immensely popular James Bond "" series written by Ian Fleming. NAL also published new "quality" paperback editions of classic works â€™ for example, a Shakespeare series â€™ which featured renowned scholars, editors, and translators. Many of those editions were oriented toward a high school and college readership. Those paperbound books included subjects in the humanities, the arts, and the sciences. NAL also published at least two notable "magazines in book form": New World Writing in the s and early s, and New American Review in the latter s and early s which then moved on to other publishers as American Review. NAL enjoyed great success: NAL became involved with the censorship trials when certain books were deemed inflammatory and subsequently banned. Victor Weybright was asked to testify before a House Committee that examined pornography. Rather than accept government restrictions, Weybright endorsed a self-regulated censorship policy on the part of publishing companies. I pointed out with some justification, but certainly not as my basic argument, that the Mentor list was essential as part of the character and prestige of our company and an indispensable exhibit when our more daring fiction â€™ by Faulkner, Farrell, and Caldwell â€™ was attacked by the censors. In Odyssey Partners and Ira J. At the time of the sale New American Library had over 1 billion paperback books in print. Dutton, an independent hardcover and trade publisher. NAL had started publishing hardcovers in with mixed success and determined that Dutton would give them an edge in that space. In June it was announced by Penguin that starting in fall of , Berkley would publish fiction titles while New American library would publish only non-fiction titles.
