Additional Information In lieu of an abstract, here is a brief excerpt of the content: In the hills leading away from the bluff lands along the river, the soil lies lightly on the ridges, a porous sandy silt called loess, easily eroded, and not very deep to start with. Driven by ancient winds following the most recent ice age, about ten thousand years ago, it covered the higher ridges, twenty feet deep in places, but lay more thinly, sometimes less than a foot deep, where wind scoured the side hills. Such soil covered all of Wabasha, Winona, and Houston counties, and a little over half of the southeast Minnesota region. Udalfsâ€™ a suborder of Alfisols, which are characteristically forested. This green landscape now wears a bucolic mantle of farmed domesticity that belies its dramatic wilderness history. The wind that drove that soil across steep hills to drift over high ridges bespeaks a turbulent, tumultuous time when everything loose was up for grabs. Today I am driving along an ecological border country Farmers Talking about Farming between grasslands and deciduous hardwoods, moving in and out of vestigial remnants that hang on despite our agriculture. Experts would probably call it a transition zone. Along Minnesota 58, we move in and out of noncontiguous bits of tallgrass prairie and maple, oak, basswood timber, both zones mostly broken up by agriculture: The bluff lands along the eastern half of Goodhue County are covered with this soil; the western half is rapidly becoming prairie. In the fifteen miles between Red Wing and the town of Goodhue, the shift from river bluffs and timber to tallgrass prairieâ€™ big bluestem and Indian grassâ€™ is so abrupt that it is apparent even to my untrained eye, even if the bluestem is now gone along this stretch, replaced by corn and soybeans. In this area, some of the rotting limestone beneath has collapsed on itself, forming caves and underground streams and lakes, groundwater we depend on for drinking, agriculture, and industry. On some of those exposed limestone layers, ancient striations and grooves, clear as road signs, lay out the direction of glaciers earlier than our last wave, apparently headed south for the winter. Inside the rock, fossils of marine plants and animals tell us cool northerners that our land once endured an equatorial climate in that geologic time called Silurian. How our dour, stoic pleasure in our ability to stand the cold would have suffered in such heat! Our summers now are short, and we forget stoicism to complain bitterly about the humidity. Equatorial heat year-round would surely melt our taciturn endurance like ice cream in August, raising questions about our very nature. Who would we be in such a place? Because the most recent Wisconsin glaciation bypassed the region, the glacial evidence here speaks of older events, even more ancient movements of rock and ice. Here fossils reveal earlier plants and animals that spent their lives in the shelter of glaciers far older than those that swung 30 Two Views, One Farm down through Minnesota just a bit west of here and south as far as central Iowa.
