The first options are starting to arrive now for purchase. Want to hear some thoughts on it? This is our Lenovo Smart Display review! What is the Lenovo Smart Display? To recap this device, you should know that it comes in both 8-inch and inch models. The 8-inch model comes in white with a grey back, while the bigger model has a bamboo back. A smart display in general is a lot like a Google Home or other smart speaker with Google Assistant built-in, only it has a touch display for additional interactions. That means you can tell it to Cast video or music here and there by voice, have it tell you about your day and the weather, do conversions, answer questions, control your smart home, add items to your shopping list, set timers and alarms, and place calls. But where this becomes infinitely more exciting is in the display. With that display, your smart home controls appear on the touch panel, so you can manually adjust your lights if you want. You can manually adjust your temperature too, tap on your favorite Spotify playlist, look at Google Photos albums, see the weather forecast, watch timers countdown, view traffic information, and Cast video to it rather than some place else. You can interact by touch too, which means scrolling left to right to see more info or swiping from the left edge to make it go back a page or to its main home screen. Tapping on items will let you control them or show you more info as well. Is the Lenovo Smart Display any good? I like it first and foremost as a media box in my office. Now, would this be great in my kitchen? Actually, now that I type that out, maybe it would be useful to have one in both the kitchen and bathroom? When this degree heat in Portland starts murdering my pits in this office, I can ask it what the temperature is on my Nest and then reach over and adjust the temperature to cool things off. And then I can set a reminder on it to buy some cold-as-hell beer later, which it will visually remind me to do rather than through a dot, like it would on Google Home. And when I sit back down to write up reviews in the middle of the night, I can pull up my backyard Nest camera to see which kind of bug just set off a motion detection. Other goodies This particular inch unit gets quite loud when listening to music or watching video from any service. It has a mute switch too and it looks pretty slick. The minimal white design, curved back with bamboo, and size fit nicely onto my desk with all of these other monitors and computer equipment. I could see it blending in nicely on a counter or bookshelf or just about any other spot around the house too. The display is good enough on this inch version, with ample brightness and a proper, non-ridiculous color profile, which is important since it will be used to stare at photos or video. And they look like they were designed in , where the Show has more of that bar room video poker vibe. Sound My biggest gripe has to be with the speaker. With hip hop, there is almost this vocal separation that pushes the beat into the background. With rock or pop, it improves some, but still sounds similarly. I thought that was initially the promise, but it really only flips to portrait when you use Duo to make a video call. That kind of sucks. The ability to flip the device upright makes it more flexible in spaces around your home and was a decent added bonus to the feature set. Not all of us want to use that damn Google hotword every time we want to do something. This device seems somewhat slow when you tap on cards too. For example, if I tap on Spotify or YouTube, it takes a good seconds before it finally opens those services to let me choose options within them. And you can see it thinking during that time. Either way, a performance boost after you tap on something would be great. Should you pick-up a Lenovo Smart Display? There are bound to be countless others who make them too, including Google, who could show one off in October with new Pixel phones. If you like being an early adopter, though, this Lenovo Smart Display is pretty good. Buy Lenovo Smart Display:

I suspect the problem is down to the print statement rather than anything inherent to the python (it works fine on my Mac). In order to print the string, it needs to convert it into a displayable format; the longer dash you've used isn't displayable in the default character set on the Windows command line.
