The novel is a story-within-a-story. Sal lived on a farm in Bybanks, Kentucky, with her mother and father. Her parents seemed to love each other very much and Sal, "a country girl at heart," was at home on the farm. Her solution is to go away "to clear her head, and to clear her heart of all the bad things. Sal and her father are lost without her mother, but eventually they settle into a routine of their own. Sal is angry at her mother for leaving. Her mother sends her postcards from every stop the bus makes en route to Idaho. She is sad and angry, and she misses her mother terribly. She also feels guilty. She feels it is her fault her mother left in the first place. Sal meets Phoebe Winterbottom, who lives across the street from Margaret. Mary Lou has a cousin named Ben who is living with her family. She is not surprised when Phoebe goes home from school one day and finds that her mother has disappeared. Winterbottom has left Phoebe, her sister, and Mr. Winterbottom notes and has stocked the freezer with food. Phoebe is angry and hurt because her mother has abandoned her. Phoebe acts like an "ornery donkey. Creech leads readers to believe that Mrs. Winterbottom will be staying home and that major changes will take place in the Winterbottom household. At the same time Mrs. Phoebe is convinced a "lunatic" has left the messages. Phoebe believes the "lunatic" is a young man who came to the door one day – the young man turns out to be her half brother, and the "lunatic" who was leaving the messages, turns out to be Mrs. In Illinois they stop and put their feet in Lake Michigan. Sal understands that when Gram says, "Huzza, huzza! Her grandmother dances with Indians in Wisconsin and gets bitten by a poisonous snake in South Dakota, forcing her to spend the night in the hospital. They see Mount Rushmore and Old Faithful. They drive directly to the hospital and Gram is admitted. The doctors tell Sal and Gramps that Gram has had a stroke; Gram dies early the next morning. She realizes that the trip to Idaho "had been a gift from Gram and Gramps to [her]. Gramps is living with them and Gram is buried in the Aspen grove. Gramps has a new beagle puppy named Huzza Huzza. Sal misses her mother, but she is happy being back on the farm she loves so much.
