Chapter 5 : A Weekend with the Family () - IMDb

Those two days after Friday can feel like a huge chasm, when you have kids to entertain. It's easy to get stuck into the same routine and lose all inspirational ideas.

He backs away for fear of my reaction. As a new parent, everyone else seems so happy all the time. I take my kids to the park on the weekend, and the place is filled with parents who seem anxious to spend their whole day there. I thought that meant I was a bad mom. The hubs wants more freedom and feels guilty for not wanting his life to only consist of work and time with the kids. I want to exercise, spend a little time alone, or better yet, with the newspaper. We both want to spend time with our son, together and apart. Give yourself a break from having to enforce the rules, and give your kids a break from having to live by them. Together, we came up with a plan that would help us BOTH enjoy our weekends. Let loose on the rules, and inject a little more fun into your weekends. This may mean you have a "Carpet Picnic" breakfast in front of the TV your kid, not you, "Silly Sunday" breakfast for dinner or "PJ Mornings" which may last well past lunch. A bored mom is a bored kid, so fill your weekends with stuff you actually like to do with your kids. Most parents see weekends as, "How long until Monday? More parents are better than one, and it takes the heat off of you. In Defense of Bouncing on the Bed 4. So if the kid watches a little extra TV while you do the New York Times crossword puzzle, have at it. Those puzzles are tough! Ask for time off. Most working parents will confess to feeling incredibly guilty for not wanting to spend every waking moment of their weekend with their kids or spouse. Be honest and let your spouse be honest, too. If you love that spin class, schedule it in and leave dad home with the kiddos. If he loves that tennis game and hates to miss it, give him your blessing. We call her the marriage saver, the college girl who comes over some Saturday mornings and hangs out with our kids for a couple hours while my husband and I both do things we want to doâ€”separate from our kids, and separate from one another. My husband loves his morning tennis game and finds the time helps him to de-stress from a hard week at work. The rest of the weekend is "all hands on deck," and we love it.

Chapter 6 : Short Breaks in England at the Chessington Safari Hotel
